Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, when an appeal was taken last year from the decision of Chairman HARRISON in a similar case, I voted against sustaining the position of the Chair, and I intend to vote in favor of the appeal against the Chair to-day. I am going to do it now for the same reason that I did it last year. I listened with a great deal of attention to the argument of the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], a minute ago. I could not fail to contrast it with the magnificent argument which he made the other day in favor of passing the bill to validate otherwise invalid contracts. He seemed then to glory in the fact that the War Department had cut red tape whenever necessary, but, forsooth, we here in the House, bound by the red tape of rules, may not cut the red tape to accomplish the public weal. I take it, that the rules were made for the House and not the House for the rules. I take it, that the rules of this House were made for the purpose of doing business and not for the purpose of preventing business from being done.

And I say that the highest prerogative of the House and the Committee of the Whole alike is that whenever a rule prevents the performance of public business, then the House or the committee has the right to proceed to do business. Now, the rivers and canals of this country are as one; they are a means of transportation, and they can not be considered, in my opinion, separate and apart one from the other. And, Mr. Chairman, I want to impress this upon the membership of this committee, if I may, and that is this: That this committee in the final analysis is the judge itself of the rule. [Applause.] And that when this committee says what the rule is that is the rule, and from the decision of this committee there is and there can be no appeal. We can appeal from the decision of the Chair when he undertakes to interpret the rule, and then the interpretation of the rule is taken from the Chair, placed in the hands of you and I, and it is for us to say what the rule is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman has very correctly interpreted the situation. I want to ask him if he recalls this instance as bearing upon the rights or prerogatives of the committee to overrule the Chair at times. A bill was brought in and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burton], who has been held up as one of the great chairmen of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, having some interest in a public building in Cleveland, sought to have a proviso that the building should be constructed of granite. A point of order was made and sustained by the Chair, the Chairman at the time being no less distinguished a person than Mr. Sherman, subsequently Vice President of the United States. The gentleman from Ohio persisted, and his appeal from Mr. Sherman's decision was sustained.

The Committee of the Whole, exercising the right which we hope it will exercise here, appealed from the decision of the Chair and overruled him in a case not so meritorious as this. Now, does the gentleman think there is any impropriety in taking similar action to-day?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Far from any impropriety, in answer to the gentleman's question——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to correct——

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Let me finish and then I will yield. Far from there being any impropriety in voting to overrule the Chair, I take it that it is our absolute duty, if we disagree with the Chair in his interpretation of the rule, to vote to overrule him, irrespective of who the Chair may be, where he comes from, what his intellectual attainments are, or what his knowledge of the rules may be. Now I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I merely rose to ask the privilege of correcting the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Do that on some one else's time, may I beg. Mr. Chairman, I want to add one further word, and that is this: I agree fully with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that we are a law-making body. I sincerely hope that we are a law-abiding body, but, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this to the membership of the committee, that there is a great difference between a law and the rules of the House. A law is something that I am obliged to obey, because it is the law of my land. The rules of this House, if I interpret them correctly, are like the rules of any other legislative body. They are simply a form of procedure. There is nothing sacred about them. They are made one day and unmade the next. They are made to govern our deliberations, not to bind our actions, and whenever those rules interfere in any way with the business of the people the rules should be changed, and there are two ways to change them. First, by action of the body in the making of rules; and, second, by the body itself declaring what interpretation the rules are entitled to. [Applause.]

Mr. JUUL rose.

Mr. SMALL. I want to ask the gentleman how much time he desires; we are anxious to close.

Mr. JUUL. Less than five minutes, but I would like to have that.

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have some time before a vote is taken.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is because I am desirous of following the suggestion and advice of the minority leader [Mr. MANN] to cut red tape that I step to the front here to-day. I believe in rules, but I do not believe that rules should be permitted to cripple the power of 400 gentlemen to act in an emergency. I think this bill is chock full of appropriations that ought never to be made, but I think we are stopping at the wrong place. Now, this is a proposition to complete the improvement of Generals Cut, in Georgia, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 581, Sixty-third Congress. It calls for $1,000. In lines 6 and 7 you are asked to appropriate $35,000 for the Altamaha River. Now, imagine a body that passes on $35,000 for the Altamaha River and must stop at the completion of an improvement connecting that river with the other river because, forsooth, 176 years ago part of the connecting link was cut with spades instead of being formed by nature. That is exactly what you are trying to hesitate at. The cut is there; it has been there for a long time. One gentleman said here that this was a boat connection. When I reached Georgia, about 40 years ago, there was absolutely no means for getting up to the city of Darien from the Atlantic Ocean except by boat, and I went there in a sailboat and was glad to get there that way. [Applause.] Now, we can appropriate $35,000 for the Altamaha River and $50,000 for the Darien River, but we can not connect the two rivers with $1,000, because 176 years ago men used spades in connecting the two streams. I think, gentlemen, that is carrying the rule too far. I believe rules are made for the purpose of transacting business and not for the purpose of blocking business. [Applause.] And believing that I would like to be able to consider and vote for this item, and I would probably refrain from voting for half of the stuff that is in the bill, because I think it never ought to be in it. I am not in favor of voting money for the River of Jordan or the River of Doubt, but here is a proposition where gentlemen are stopping and raising an issue at the wrong time and in the wrong place. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, not to interfere with the gentleman's recognition, may I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this appeal close in 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be granted to the gentleman from Wisconsin——

Mr. STAFFORD. The five-minute rule, as the gentleman knows, does not apply in discussion of questions of appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SMALL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would not want to be limited. I do not desire unlimited time, but I think 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the rules of the House, when we are in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, I ask whether time for debate is not limited to five minutes on an appeal from the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. On an appeal the time is one hour, in the opinion of the Chair, without close examination of rules and precedents.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the same rule obtain in the Committee of the Whole as to limitation of debate as obtains in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the Chair is of that opinion now. However, the Chair will state that it is in order to close debate whenever the committee sees fit.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I submit the unanimous-consent request that the debate on the appeal close in 15 minutes, 10 minutes to be consumed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and 5 minutes by myself.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SMALL. Seventeen minutes, then; two minutes to be consumed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] asks unanimous consent that the debate upon the appeal be limited to 17 minutes.

Mr. SMALL. May I modify that and make it 23 minutes, 10 minutes to be consumed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], 5 minutes by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN], 3 minutes by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], and 5 minutes to myself?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina modifies his request to the effect that the debate upon this appeal be limited to 23 minutes, 10 minutes to be consumed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], 5 minutes by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN], 3 minutes by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], and 5 minutes by himself. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, no more important question on the integrity of the procedure of the House can confront the Committee of the Whole than passing upon an appeal from the decision of the Chair. It is admitted by those who seek to overthrow the rules of the House that the decision of the Chair is correct, and yet we have here to-day, by those who favor river and harbor appropriations, the revolutionary doctrine proposed, that whenever a majority of this House believes that there is merit in a proposition, notwithstanding the rules of the House for its orderly procedure, the majority shall control regardless of what the House in its calm moments has determined should be the rule of procedure. If that is going to be the practice here is it to be the policy, whenever a member of the Committee on Appropriations, who happens to have some item out of order in an appropriation bill ruled out of order under the rules, because of the rule that no legislation should be carried on an appropriation bill, to rise and appeal from the decision of the Chair? Rarely has it been resorted to. I recall only three or four instances. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who again assumes to overthrow the rules, as he did two years ago, cites an instance about former Representative Burton, of Ohio, when he moved to overrule the decision of the Chair. He is in error when he says it was on a river and harbor bill. He does not know the facts. If he had known the facts he would not have referred to that instance as there was an exceptional condition that might have justified the committee in then setting aside the decision of the Chair, because Mr. Burton then admitted that he was out of the Chamber and engaged in committee work at the time when the amendment which he offered to the House would have been in order. Mr. James S. Sherman, then in the chair, ruled, on the sundry civil appropriation bill, where Mr. Burton sought to have this amendment incorporated, that it would have been in order if the gentleman from Ohio had presented it in time. The House thought an unfair advantage was being taken of Mr. Burton and they made that exception. But I very well remember the late Republican leader, Mr. Sereno E. Payne, rising on the floor when a like attempt was made to overrule the decision of the Chair, and appealing to Members, regardless of party, regardless of their interest in the individual proposition, not to have them set aside all rules but calling attention to the necessity, as pointed out by former leader Dingley, of adhering to the rules of the House if they were to have good legislation.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], another member of this committee, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], and these other Members, rise in an attempt here to try to overrule the decision of the Chair, to set aside all precedents, and allow any character of legislation to be considered on this bill. This river and harbor bill is the one bill of all bills, when it is under attack from the country at large, where we should observe strictly the rules of the House, and where it should not be said that we lightly set aside the rules of the House to consider a project over which the committee has no jurisdiction. I am surprised and amazed that members of the committee should justify this revolutionary doctrine, that whenever they see fit, on some amendment which is out of order, immediately arise and move to overrule the decision of the Chair.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], a learned attorney, says the merits of the proposition are more important. Why, if we were to follow that idea there would be chaos and pandemonium here in this Chamber in the consideration of its legislation. If we were to follow that course and adopt the position of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS], there would be no rules. The will of the majority at all times would be supreme, and the very purpose of the rules, as the purpose of all law, is to protect the minority against the present majority. The majority of to-day may be the minority of to-morrow.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I will be glad to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman is a skilled parliamentarian. What is the difference in parliamentary law between the right to purchase and operate a canal on yesterday and the right to dig out a canal to-day?

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, I know nothing about the merits of the proposition, but I know this: That under the established precedents of this House legislation with respect to canals does not rest with the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I know further that under the precedents of this House, respecting river and harbor bills, matters may be reported which are not privileged, over which the committee has jurisdiction, but they can not be considered on a river and harbor appropriation bill, but those matters must take their ordinary course just like any other bill.

The gentleman from Louisiana cites the case of the consideration of a bill granting to the War Department authority to adjust claims that have not been executed properly. That bill was brought in under the regular orderly procedure. There is always recourse on the part of a committee, or a majority of the House, when they desire to have a thing put in order on an appropriation bill to go to the proper committee, and that is the Committee on Rules. There is no majority in this House at this time. Three-fourths of those who are present are interested in this project, and it is to protect, perchance, the majority of this House who are absent at the present time against the raids and ravages that are being perpetrated by these sponsors of large river and harbor improvements that the rules are placed there.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not just now. As I say, I have no concern with the merits of the propositions. What is a thousand dollars? But I am concerned with the more fundamental proposition, and that is that if we recognize now on a river and harbor bill the right to hold in order a proposition for the improvement of a canal, or the building of a canal, it is a dangerous precedent that is going to come to plague us in the future. There will be nothing to prevent a Member on the floor of the House getting his friends here and offering amendments to build a canal involving the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars. With the power of a majority favoring it it can be rushed through despite the rules of the House providing that that legislation must first be considered by a committee. That is the object of those who now seek to have the orderly rules of the House superseded. They say, in effect, that any extraneous amendment that is not in order may be considered on the spur of the moment if supported by a majority. That is a radical departure from orderly procedure.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman from Wisconsin misunderstood my question. What I am trying to get at is the continuity of the rule. How can a rule be hot and cold? Why should the rule permit a canal to be bought or purchased on page 7 and forbid a canal to be improved on page 11? Why did not the gentleman make the point of order yesterday?

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not make the point of order on this proposition. The gentleman can not throw that at me. I am consistent. I am not concerned about the merits of the item. I would not have made the point of order. But I am rising here, independent of the merits of the proposition, appealing to Members who are in favor of maintaining the integrity of the rules of the House to stand by those rules now. It is revolutionary to attempt to override the decision of the Chair. I appeal to Members to stand by and protect the rules against the ravages that are being made against their integrity.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Here is a ravage of three millions yesterday, when the gentleman did not open his mouth, and here is a ravage of $1,000 to-day, and the gentleman cries aloud.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is not on the merits of the proposition. This is on the question of the integrity of the rules of the House. I hope the gentleman will see the difference between the question of order and the question of merit in digging a little $1,000 canal. I hope the gentleman has that breadth of vision.

Mr. SLOAN. If the gentleman's contention is correct, that it will prevent the building or construction of these rivers, where, then, will we be able to place our expenditures hereafter when we shall have filled up our rivers, creeks, brooks, affluents, rivulets, runnels, and all?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question as to the authority of the committee to report an item for the improvement of a river or harbor. This item is for the construction of a canal, and the question before the House is, Shall we maintain the integrity of the rules of the House?

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy the time of the committee a few moments, in order that I may not be subjected to the criticism which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] seemingly would inflict upon the House. He takes the position that we are trying to override the rules of the House. I deny the charge; we are only endeavoring to properly construe a rule made by the House.

The rule under consideration is only the expression of the will of the House as to the manner of its deliberations, and the vote that we take will be an interpretation of that expression. Two years ago the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] ruled on a similar question that such a proposition was not in order. That was his interpretation of the rule, but an appeal was taken from his decision, and this House in good faith sustained the appeal.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I feel that I should be bound by the decision of the majority and by the interpretation of the rule as then expressed by the membership of the House.

I think the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], for whom I have very high regard, is very much in error and does little credit to the integrity of the House. He says we should stick to the rules of the House. The inference is that the House on previous occasion violated its own rules by sustaining the appeal from the decision of Chairman HARRISON.

Gentlemen of the House, I doubt whether it is fair to take the position at this time that the House was in error two years ago. For one, I believe in the wisdom of this House and in its integrity. I believe that the vote on this proposition will be properly interpreted; that the Members of this House will vote properly on it; and whether they do, in my judgment, vote properly or not, I shall not be inclined to criticize.

Mr. Chairman, so far as the merits of the proposition are concerned, I think they are against the ruling of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. I do not believe that he thoroughly understands the facts. I believe that if he did he would not have made the ruling. Believing that the Chairman is in error, I shall vote in favor of the appeal. If I believed that he was right, I would vote to sustain him. I believe a majority of the membership of this House will vote to overrule him. In doing so they will vote to establish an interpretation consistent with what they conscientiously believe to be the rule. It will be without an effort to supersede any rule.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, we ought not to speak lightly of that which is properly classed as the observance of law, because we ask all our people through the length and breadth of this land to observe the law of the land. There is no higher duty of citizenship to any man than to be a law-respecting and law-abiding citizen. That is precisely the question which is presented here. The rules of this House of Representatives are the law of the Members of this House, and I submit, even though we realize the very personal interest which some Members of this House have, it is not for us to adhere to a rule when it pleases us and to violate a rule deliberately because, perchance, we have an assembly of friends here who may wish to set the rule aside. Therefore I seek to impress upon the membership of this committee that it is not a light question that you are acting upon when by an appeal you seek to override the ruling of the Chair; because, in the first place, the ruling of the Chair is right. Nobody takes the floor and says the ruling of the Chair is wrong. There is no reason, as a matter of truth and of justice and of logic, why the appeal should be sustained or why the ruling of the Chair should be overruled.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GARD. I am glad to yield, although I have a very limited time.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The gentleman is assuming that this is a canal and not a watercourse. Now, suppose that is not the fact. Suppose this was a watercourse nearly a hundred years before these rules were made, and that it was an existing watercourse at that time?

Mr. GARD. Of course, that presents an entirely different state of fact. I assume that it is a canal, because I recall from the statement of the chairman and the statements of other gentlemen here that a part of this is admittedly a canal. Now, if it is a canal and we have a rule covering it, that rule is a law unto the membership of the House of Representatives, and to say that it should be swept aside merely because it is in somebody's interest to sweep it aside means in the last analysis that we are bordering on anarchy in the House of Representatives; because a rule is a law, and if a rule is a wrong one it should be changed, modified, or altered in proper way. It should not be peremptorily set aside merely because of the personal interest of the moment.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief in making a few comments upon this appeal from the decision of the Chair. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole has exercised his judgment and has interpreted a point of order against the item in the bill. Members of the Committee of the Whole now have an opportunity to exercise their judgment and to say whether the point of order is well taken. The action of the Committee of the Whole on this appeal does not involve any disparagement of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. If the appeal is sustained, it is simply the exercise of the judgment of the aggregate body as against the judgment of one Member. I have had occasion so often to give approval to the position taken by the distinguished minority leader [Mr. MANN] upon nonpartisan questions that I was rather surprised at the emphasis which he gave to the sanctity of the rules of this House. Are these rules sacred? May I give just a few instances of how the House frequently sets aside the rules of the House. We have a day on which motions are made to suspend the rules and pass bills. Admittedly these bills would not be in order on that day unless two-thirds of the House should suspend the rules and pass them. Session after session the Committee on Rules bring in resolutions making certain bills in order, regardless of the rules of the House. We have had reports from the Committee on Rules making in order a certain bill by a committee when under the rules of the House it was not within the jurisdiction of that committee. We had in the last session, I think, a resolution from the Committee on Rules, when the Post Office bill was under consideration, making certain provisions in order on that bill when under the rules of the House they were not in order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But the Committee on Rules brought in that resolution under the authority of the general rules.

Mr. SMALL. I understand that, of course; but I may ask, Is the Committee on Rules, created by the House, superior to the body which created it?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is not. It can not do anything that the House itself does not authorize.

Mr. SMALL. Certainly, and nothing will be done regarding this item except what the House authorizes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, there is not even a quorum of the committee here—less than 100 Members. You are asking that less than a quorum shall pass upon this question.

Mr. SMALL. That has nothing to do with it. We are in Committee of the Whole. The Committee of the Whole has a right to pass on this question, and I am simply submitting this question, that if under the rules we create a committee which has the right to bring in a resolution suspending these sacred rules, even under the rigorous contention of some Members here, this Committee of the Whole may at least appeal from the judgment of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, and exercise their judgment, and say that their judgment is one way and the judgment of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole another way.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I want to ask the gentleman if every proposition in this bill for which an appropriation has been made looking to continued improvement of inland waterways has not originally emanated from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. SMALL. I know of no exception to it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Briefly, because my time is limited.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from North Carolina was discussing the bringing in of rules by the Committee on Rules and making in order matters not theretofore in order. Does not the gentleman from North Carolina distinguish the difference between the bringing in of a rule for a given purpose and the overruling of a decision of the Chair for a specific purpose? The one creates a precedent to be followed thereafter; the other does not.

Mr. SMALL. I can make the distinction. Of course, the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Rules and is jealous of the jurisdiction of his committee; but the point I am making is that these sacred rules are frequently set aside by the House and by the Committee of the Whole, and that the Committee of the Whole may do so in this instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chairman stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 40, noes 33.

Mr. DUPRÉ and Mr. CALDWELL asked for tellers.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. This question is being submitted to the committee. For that reason let us have a full committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes a point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty Members present, a quorum.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I have asked for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. DUPRÉ and Mr. MADDEN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—67 ayes and 43 noes.

So the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the House.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMALL. Of course, the point of order only applies to that part of the paragraph; that is to say, the part in this language—completing improvement of Generals Cut, Ga., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 581, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $1,000.

Mr. MADDEN. That is all.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment. The amount at the end of the paragraph should be $28,000, and I move to strike out the figures "$29,000" and insert "$28,000."

Page 11, line 5, strike out "$29,000" and insert "$28,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Altamaha, Oconee, and Ocmulgee Rivers, Ga.: For maintenance, $35,000.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to section 6, which I send to the desk.

Page 11, line 7, after the word "maintenance," strike out the figures "$35,000" and insert "$40,000."

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, in 1911 a survey of the Altamaha River system was ordered and was made by Dan C. Kingman in the early part of 1912. The engineer making the survey and report recommended an appropriation of $635,000 and some cents for the improvement of this Altamaha River system, to be divided into and expended in five annual installments of an equal amount.

When this report came before the Board of Engineers it was disapproved, but with the recommendation, however, of the board that the annual appropriation for the system should not exceed $40,000 per annum. For each and every year since that time, with the exception of one year, the appropriations for the Altamaha River system has been $40,000. The exception was made three or four years ago when, by action originating in the Senate, as I understand, the appropriation was increased to $60,000.

For the ensuing year the bill provides an appropriation of $35,000 for the system, which reduces the amount heretofore allowed for a number of years $5,000. The committee seeks to justify this on the theory that the same is being done in many other cases, that circumstances make it necessary, and that there remains available funds which have not been expended in previous years. The report of the engineer says there is on hand at this time something like $54,000. I want to emphasize, if I can, very briefly, the importance of this river system. The Altamaha River is the largest river in Georgia. It is a river of considerable size and, as acknowledged by the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee and by the Board of Engineers, is of considerable commercial importance.

On yesterday we voted upon a proposition authorizing an appropriation for an inland waterway between Norfolk, Va., and Beaufort, N. C. In that item the appropriation carried $750,000. I have looked up the tonnage of the river referred to in that proposition, and its total tonnage is in round numbers 185,000 tons per annum. We also had another proposition from Norfolk, Va., to North Carolina Sound for $250,000. The annual tonnage on that river is only 300,000 tons.

I take it, gentlemen of the committee, that the appropriations voted in the preceding sections were justified. Certainly I am not complaining of or question those items in the bill, but I wish to say that if those are justified, then the proposed appropriation for the Altamaha River system can not be justified, so far as the amount is concerned.

The Altamaha River system consists of three rivers, the Altamaha, the Oconee, and the Ocmulgee. In the aggregate they contain something like 490 miles of navigable streams. The system traverses 45 counties, all in Georgia. The navigable portion touches 25 counties. These are among the most productive of the State and have a taxable wealth of approximately $150,000,000, with a population of 500,000 persons. The tonnage on those streams amounts annually to from 150,000 to 170,000 tons, and have a valuation of from three to five million dollars.

Now, on the Virginia-Carolina proposition, with an annual tonnage of 185,000 tons, you voted $750,000, and on the Altamaha system, with 490 miles of navigable streams and a tonnage of from 150,000 to 170,000 tons, you propose to vote only $35,000. I ask you, gentlemen, do you think that is right; do you think it is fair; do you think it is a proper amount? The only excuse that is offered is that the appropriation made available heretofore has not been expended. Last year the people affected demanded that improvement should be made on these rivers. They appealed to me to ask a reopening of the Kingman report. I did so, and the Rivers and Harbors Committee very generously recommended that the report be opened and reconsidered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LARSEN. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. SMALL. Reserving the right to object, can not the gentleman get along with at least three minutes?

Mr. LARSEN. I will try and close in three minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Let us limit the time to six minutes, the gentleman to have three and I to take three.

Mr. LARSEN. Oh, the chairman does not need over a minute. May I not have five?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to close debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto in eight minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I presume I am entitled to five minutes.

As I said, last year we were in an unfortunate condition. People from all of the counties affected asked that relief be granted. The rivers and harbors committee recommended to the Board of Engineers that the report be opened for investigation. Hon. John C. Melliss, engineer in charge at Savannah, was instructed to make investigation. He called meetings at several points in the district, and they were very well attended. The business men met from every section and testified under oath that they had been practically forced to abandon river transportation because the rivers had been so neglected that they could not navigate them.

I urged the engineer located at Savannah to make his report. I wired and personally requested him to do so, yet so far as I am able to learn no report has been made from the Savannah office, and no adequate relief has been granted to the people of this territory. The appropriation made last year and perhaps for previous years has not been fully expended. It seems that practically all of the boats available for work on this river system suddenly became unfit for service. I do not think it was due to overwork in my part of the country. I would not say what work was done on other parts of the stream.

Last year of the money that was expended, $24,000 was in repairs of snag boats and other boats. There was spent, in round numbers, $6,473.92 for inspection—ascertaining, as I understand, what was necessary to be done, trying to determine where they should work and what they should do. There was spent $4,680 for office expenses, while for operation, exclusive of repairs on boats, $3,706.05.

As repairs seem to have been made, we trust the remainder will be spent for operating. If this money could not be expended last year, it should be spent this year. All we want is that sufficient money be made available at this time. It can be expended by an industrious engineer at Savannah in a short while. We have a new engineer in the district now. The people in the territory demanded that the engineer shall go to work. With sufficient available funds I think it is likely that good work will be done. If we do not spend the money, certainly the Government will not be hurt. If it be spent, the returns will be good and benefit will accrue to the people. Upon the Oconee, one of this system of rivers, is located at Milledgeville, the old State capital, and Dublin, one of the most progressive cities in Georgia. Macon is at the head of navigation on the Ocmulgee, and Hawkinsville and other prosperous cities are on this stream. There is direct transportation from Macon to Darien and Brunswick on the coast. What we need is to have the snags, shoals, and rocks taken out and the system of rivers put into proper shape for navigation. It is a very important system. It is the only river system of any importance in the State of Georgia and it is being neglected. We ask now to increase the amount to the minimum appropriation that has been allowed heretofore, $40,000. It is an increase of only $5,000, and the money will only be made available.

I trust gentlemen of the committee will see fit to vote for the amendment.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, just a brief reply. It would have been more appropriate if the gentleman had omitted comparisons from his remarks, particularly as the statements as to tonnage in his remarks were incorrect.

Mr. LARSEN. I will ask the gentleman to state the correct figures.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman has the reports before him. I simply state that they are incorrect. As to the amendment to increase this appropriation from $35,000 to $40,000, this is a system of rivers consisting of the Altamaha, the Oconee, and the Ocmulgee. The Altamaha River is formed by the confluence of the Oconee and Ocmulgee Rivers at a point known as The Forks. The Altamaha is navigable for 37 miles. The Oconee is navigable for about 145 miles and the Ocmulgee for about 205 miles. It is one of those sluggish streams where it is difficult to maintain the channel. The project depth is for 3 feet, with an effort to increase it to 4 feet. There is now more than $50,000 on hand, and the engineers, after careful investigation at the request of the committee, report that this additional amount of $35,000, added to the amount which is on hand, is all that could be profitably expended to the end of the next fiscal year. If the Committee of the Whole should increase this appropriation, it will constitute an exception. There is no appropriation in this bill in excess of the sum recommended by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. LARSEN. May I ask the chairman one question, inasmuch as he has questioned the accuracy of my statement as to tonnage?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up unnecessary time. The gentleman endeavored to state the tonnage upon some other improvement not connected with this.

Mr. LARSEN. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SMALL. I do not wish to go into an extraneous matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. LARSEN) there were—ayes 6, noes 15.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

St. Johns River, Fla., Jacksonville to the ocean, opposite the city of Jacksonville, Jacksonville to Palatka, and Palatka to Lake Harney, Lake Crescent, and Dunns Creek, and Oklawaha River, Fla.: For maintenance, $108,000; for improvement between Jacksonville and Palatka, $9,000: Provided, That the project for this section may be extended, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 699, Sixty-third Congress, second session: Provided further, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement; in all, $117,000.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 16, after "Palatka," strike out "$9,000" and insert "$25,000"; on page 11, line 17, after "Provided," strike out all down to and including the word "session," in line 20, and insert the following: "that $9,000 of the above amount shall be expended by the Secretary of War in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 699, Sixty-third Congress, second session"; and in line 23, page 11, strike out "$117,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$133,000."

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Gentlemen of the committee, insomuch as the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina challenged the statement which I made a few minutes ago as to the tonnage of the proposition voted upon yesterday, I feel that in justice to myself and in fairness to the House I should state to the House how I arrived at the tonnage. I neglected to say the average tonnage for the last five years. To be exact, the average tonnage of the proposition for the past five years was 185,459 tons. See comparative statement, part 1, of the Report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, page 575.

Mr. SMALL. What improvement is that?

Mr. LARSEN. I am speaking of that one in Virginia, of this inland waterway, Norfolk to Beaufort, N. C. The average tonnage was 185,459 tons for the past five years, but the tonnage, as I find from the record for the past two years, instead of being what I said it averaged for the five years, was a great deal less. The tonnage for 1916 was 141,029 tons and for 1917 it was 148,134 tons. I take it for granted that the distinguished chairman, when I asked him to state the tonnage, would have done so except that he felt like it might possibly embarrass him and the other members of the committee. I would not desire to do that; at the same time I do not like to be embarrassed by having my integrity questioned before the House in that way. I want to be fair with this House. I try to be fair with everybody, and I would not purposely make a misstatement of facts to this House or to anyone else. Now, I am not making any criticism about the appropriation involved. I voted for it, and I am glad I did. You gentlemen did not vote for my appropriation, and I have no hard feelings on that account. I want to put myself straight before the House, that is all.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, just a word in reference to the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN]. A great many times in this House it has been explained, and if the gentleman could have been present and listened——

Mr. LARSEN. I was.

Mr. SMALL. He would have found it unnecessary to have made the statement which he did. Let me call attention to the fact that in the waterway from Norfolk to Albemarle Sound there are two canals. Both of these canals lead from Norfolk to Albemarle Sound, N. C., and are substantially parallel. One of these, the Chesapeake & Albemarle Canal, has been acquired by the United States and is under improvement. On both of these canals before this war the aggregate commerce was between 800,000 and 900,000 tons and of a valuation of several millions of dollars. Even during this war it amounted to between 400,000 and 500,000 tons, with a value, as the gentleman will see, of from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000. And so once more I make the explanation to gentlemen who every now and then make a discovery.

Mr. LARSEN. May I ask the gentleman where he got those figures and whether they are in this report of 1918?

Mr. SMALL. I will cite them to the gentleman. You only cited the commerce as to one canal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS], I am sure every member of the committee will join with me in this expression, that if, as the gentleman from Florida thinks, and I have no doubt thinks sincerely, his section of Florida has not been cared for in this bill, it is not the fault of the gentleman from Florida himself. He has diligently appeared before the committee, has made, as he always does, attractive arguments, and produced evidence which, in his opinion, would induce the committee to act favorably upon the amendments to the bill suggested by him.

The committee, however, were actuated simply by the desire to discharge their duty. A committee must have some policy, Mr. Chairman. By law we constitute the engineers as the experts to determine how much they can spend profitably and wisely during the next fiscal year. If the Committee of the Whole or if the House attempts—certainly not in a thorough way, but necessarily in a hurried manner—to say how much can be spent, it will be seen that mistakes will be made. Now, the committee appropriated here all that was recommended. There is $108,000 carried. It is true that that is recommended specifically for the St. Johns River from Jacksonville to the ocean. But that portion of the St. Johns River from Jacksonville to Palatka is in the same group, and if it transpires that the other portion of the river above Jacksonville should require some of this $108,000, it will be within the discretion of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers to determine how much shall be diverted.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. SEARS. The appropriation specifically reads:

St. Johns River, Fla., Jacksonville to the ocean, opposite the city of Jacksonville, Jacksonville to Palatka, and Palatka to Lake Harney.

And for several years appropriations have been made for that. Does the gentleman contend that the War Department could take a part of the money appropriated by Congress to be used to improve the St. Johns River from Palatka to Lake Harney?

Mr. SMALL. Under the consolidated item that is authorized. You will find that we carry a provision in this bill——

Mr. SEARS. The War Department has specifically stated that it will take $108,000 and that that can be expended profitably from Jacksonville to the ocean. Then how are they going to use any money on this other part of the river?

Mr. SMALL. If the emergency arises so as to make it necessary to use any money from Jacksonville to Palatka they can divert a part of this $108,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMALL. I call the attention of the committee to another provision in this bill. This bill carrier a lump-sum appropriation of $1,000,000 for meeting emergencies which could not be foreseen at the time that this bill was formulated and reported to the House. And if it should transpire that that portion of the river needs any expenditure, it can be taken from that lump-sum appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SEARS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 25.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SEARS: Page 11, line 17, after the word "section" strike out "may" and insert "shall"; and on line 18, strike out "in the discretion of" and insert "by."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment if adopted will read:

Provided, That the project for this section shall be expended by the Secretary of War.

In other words, the section as it now reads means nothing. The Secretary of War can spend that $9,000 on an improvement of the river from Jacksonville to Palatka, when the committee, as I understand it, intended to give that to me for improvement of Deep Creek. I believe the Congress can act and should act affirmatively. If you mean what you said, make it "shall" and direct the Secretary of War as to what he shall do. If you do not mean it, leave it just like it is, and if this motion does not prevail then I shall make another motion, one to strike out.

Mr. SMALL. If I may have the attention of the members of the committee, they will remember this phraseology was discussed, and, individually, as a member of the committee, I see no serious objection to removing it from the discretion of the Secretary and making it mandatory. It is based upon a favorable report. If any member of the committee thinks otherwise I would be glad to hear from him. But that is my judgment in regard to the matter.

I take the liberty, then, of accepting the amendment.

Mr. SEARS. I am glad the chairman accepts it, because I will state frankly to the House if the amendment had not been carried I would have moved to strike it out, because it should not be in there as it now reads. To stay there as it now appears would be to fool my district or fool myself, and make those people believe they were going to get something when perhaps they would not, and it would be placed in the bill by the Senate as in 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Removing the water hyacinth, Florida: For the removal of the water hyacinth from the navigable waters in the State of Florida, in so far as it is or may become an obstruction to navigation, $10,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the word "hyacinth" on line 7 and the word "hyacinth" on line 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 12, line 7, strike out the word "hyacinth," and also on line 8 strike out the word "hyacinth."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I believe this amendment ought to prevail, because there will not be anything in the way of obstruction in these channels but the water if the word "hyacinth" is stricken out. If we are going to spend $10,000 for any purpose, I think it would be well spent if it were spent for moving the water from these channels. [Laughter.] I verily believe that there is very little water in most of these channels that this $10,000 is appropriated for.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. SEARS. The State of Florida having just passed a prohibition amendment and having made it an offense punishable by a fine of $500 the first time a man gets drunk, do you think that would take the water out of Florida? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. That is the best argument I have heard made for keeping this appropriation in. In years gone by we have ridiculed the idea of appropriating money to remove weeds from navigable streams. It has been contended that if there was any navigation on the streams the weeds would not grow there. Since there is no navigation and weeds must obstruct the natural flow of the stream, in my opinion we ought not to make any appropriation at all.

These streams are all covered with hyacinths, and then they are overshadowed with trees, in which the birds and monkeys, I believe, disport during the hot summer evenings. Once in a while we hear of an alligator climbing up through the hyacinths, and perhaps it is just as well that the hyacinths should remain there in order to furnish food for the alligators. [Laughter.] It does not seem that any of the natives are willing to subject themselves to the viciousness of the alligator, and therefore we must find some way to supply food to them, and I know of no better way than to permit them to feed on the hyacinths. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman's idea that when all the water is removed from these rivers their beds should be navigated by tanks? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I believe when the water is removed from these channels we should have some place to cultivate. We might cultivate the hyacinths. We might develop the water hyacinth as a native plant that could be utilized for some good purpose, and thereby we would relieve the Treasury of the United States every year from being drawn against for large sums of money for removing the hyacinths for no good purpose. If we could remove the water and permit the hyacinths to develop, we might find some chemist in the Department of Agriculture who could tell us how the hyacinths could be used for feeding the hungry in some place where the food supply is short.

The hyacinth in its natural, native form is a beautiful flower. What the hyacinth is in the Florida rivers, I hardly dare to say; but if it is an obstruction to navigation that does not exist, why should we spend the money of the United States to provide for a condition that there is no necessity for providing for?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Did you not ask that question in the Sixty-fourth Congress and a couple of times in this one already?

Mr. MADDEN. A couple of times in what?

Mr. CALDWELL. In this Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, a good thing can be asked more than once, and I have not seen anybody here who had sense enough to answer the question, no matter how many times it has been asked. Not even the gentleman from New York seems to have any knowledge on the subject. The mere fact that I have asked the question and nobody can respond justifies the continuation of the question. Does anybody know what the water hyacinth is, what its value is as a food? Does anybody know why it is permitted to obstruct the navigation on the Florida rivers where there is no navigation? Does anybody know why we should spend money to remove the hyacinth?

Mr. SEARS. The water hyacinth can not live unless it has water. If you take the water out, it will die. As Members know, it is a plant that simply obstructs, like water lilies, navigation, even more than sand. It is practically out of the rivers now, those that are navigable, but if you let it accumulate it completely stops navigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mobile Harbor and Bar and channel connecting Mobile Bay and Mississippi Sound, Ala.: For maintenance of channel connecting Mobile Bay and Mississippi Sound, $4,000; continuing improvement and for maintenance of Mobile Harbor and Bar, $100,000; in all, $104,000.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Committee amendment: Page 12, line 23, after the word "bar," strike out "$100,000; in all, $104,000," and insert in lieu thereof "$200,000; in all, $204,000."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, this amendment increases the appropriation for the maintenance and further improvement of Mobile Harbor and Bar $100,000, making the total for that particular improvement $200,000, and increasing the aggregate from $104,000 to $204,000. This amendment is based upon a communication from the Chief of Engineers recommending this increase in the appropriation.

Unless some gentleman desires to have the communication read, I will not read it, but will ask to have it appended to my remarks and inserted in the RECORD. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY] wishes recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from North Carolina will be granted to insert the letter referred to in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

JANUARY 4, 1919.

Hon. JOHN H. SMALL,
Chairman Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SMALL: The estimate submitted by this department of the amount that could be advantageously used for the improvement of Mobile Harbor, to be provided in the pending river and harbor bill, was $100,000; and when Gen. Taylor was before your committee and questioned as to whether this amount would be sufficient, he stated that in his opinion it would. Further consideration of the matter, in view of data recently received as to dredges which will probably be available for this improvement for the next year and the cost of operating these dredges, indicates that in order to carry on the work at a satisfactory rate until June 30, 1920, the estimate of $100,000 should be increased to $200,000; and it is accordingly recommended that the pending bill be amended so as to provide $200,000 for Mobile Harbor instead of $100,000.

Very truly, yours,

W. M. BLACK,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.
By H. TAYLOR,
Brigadier General, United States Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRAY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I take it that there will be no real opposition to this amendment increasing the appropriation from $100,000 to $200,000. It was thoroughly considered by the Board of Army Engineers as well as the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and after a hearing and consideration of the matter the Board of Engineers decided to recommend an increase of $100,000 from that which had already been recommended, to wit, $100,000, making the total appropriation $200,000 for Mobile Harbor improvement.

It might be well to state, gentlemen of the committee, that as a result of recent investigations on the part of the Railroad Administration it was determined that the Government should take over the canalized river that flows into Mobile Bay, the Black Warrior-Tombigbee system. This morning I obtained from the Railroad Administration, of which Mr. Tomlinson is the director, the following data, which may prove to be of interest to some members of the committee. They are already preparing to operate and have on hand seven towboats, four being for New Orleans and three for the Mobile trade. They have practically secured 23 barges to be operated upon this canalized river. I am informed that contracts are being let by Mr. Tomlinson, who is now in Mobile, looking after this project and its contemplated development. Contracts are now being let for the construction of 20 new barges.

I am informed further that they estimate that under normal conditions 600,000 tons of coal per annum will come down the canalized Warrior-Tombigbee River from the coal fields of Alabama to the Gulf and from there out into the markets of the world. The present rate on coal per ton from the coal fields of Alabama to Mobile by rail is about $1.60. The estimated cost by the Government barges is 90 cents per ton, and the saving per ton for Mobile will be 70 cents. The present railroad rate on coal to New Orleans by rail is $2.20 per ton. The estimated cost by the Government barges will be $1.57 per ton, a saving per ton for New Orleans of 63 cents. Now, gentlemen, if you will take the amount of coal alone that will likely be handled on this river—and it is estimated, as I stated, that 600,000 tons of coal will come down this river—simply multiply that by the difference in cost for transportation, which will be about 70 cents per ton on an average, and you will observe that hundreds of thousands of dollars will be saved annually to the coal consumers of this country.

So I trust, gentlemen, and am expecting that there will be no opposition to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. May I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. It may be interesting to know that the amount allotted by the administration from the revolving fund that you remember about for the new equipment for the operation of barges on the Black Warrior and Tombigbee River system is $1,600,000. That which is now being expended on the old equipment is $640,000, making the total outlay for the Government upon this project alone $2,240,000. That is to be used upon the canalized river, which will bring down these great coal resources. That says nothing about the freight that is to be carried up the river to such important railroad points and competitive points as Demopolis, Tuscaloosa, and other places. So the Government is going to spend $2,240,000 upon this river alone, and it is highly important that the channel of this great harbor should be increased to a depth of 30 feet, and rapidly, too, in order to accommodate its ever-increasing commerce, that the larger vessels drawing at least 30 feet may come into the port of Mobile. I say again, gentlemen of this committee, that I do not contemplate that this proposed amendment will meet with any opposition at your hands but will have, rather, your hearty approval. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Black Warrior, Warrior, and Tombigbee Rivers, Ala.: For improvement in accordance with the recommendation in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, $200,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman who has just finished [Mr. GRAY of Alabama], and I wish to say this in reference to him personally, that I regret very much that he will not longer be a member of our committee. He has been a faithful and an excellent member, and he has certainly urged very persistently and very strongly the merits of this particular project at Mobile. I know the conditions down there, and I desire to say this in passing, because I believe I have always opposed the project, believing it was inadvisable to put the project in the bill at that time until conditions required further improvement. But he calls my attention to the fact, in his statement, that the Government is spending $2,240,000 more upon this project, and here we have in the bill that has just been read by the Clerk an appropriation of $200,000, and I believe a project calling for $400,000 in all. If I remember correctly, the engineers made the statement to us that the boats had been practically driven off the Black Warrior River by the railroads, notwithstanding the Government had expended so much money there. How much money has the Government put into the Black Warrior River already? I read from page 2527, where it is stated that the Government has already expended $9,901,295. That has been pointed out to us as the one great project that was going to determine the value of canalization in this country. So we have put into it year after year, I understand, a total of something like $11,000,000. And with what result? If you will look at page 2530, you will see that the traffic below the locks, after deducting logs, which do not need this depth of channel, amounts to 31,000 tons. There are logs; there is some coal that is brought down; but I understand now that the boats have been driven off until the Government is obliged to build boats, just as it has been obliged to build them on the Mississippi and other places, because the railroads drive them off; and after this enormous expenditure upon this river the Government is obliged to put the money into boats to make use of it. I think, Mr. Chairman, it is an unparalleled situation, and shows what we have been doing, that we have been putting money into all these streams. We were assured that this was a completed project, and it is, but right in this bill there is an immediate appropriation of $200,000 on a $400,000 project to meet the necessities of these Government boats that are to be put in there.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information about this canalization?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly. I do not know that I can give it to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. When was this canalization of the Black Warrior completed? How long ago?

Mr. FREAR. The statement has been made repeatedly that the 6-foot channel was what was desired. I do not know but what it was more than that, but here is a new project added, besides the more than $10,000,000 that has been expended already.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. But when was the 6-foot project completed?

Mr. FREAR. I can not give the gentleman the exact date, but we have been assured that this was the one project that was completed, and it was to be a fair test.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I am asking for information.

Mr. FREAR. I can not give the gentleman the exact information. Does the gentleman say it is not completed?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No; I do not know anything about it; I am trying to find out something about it. I want to know if this project has been completed, just how long, and whether any commerce developed from the coal mines through the locks and dams before the Government undertook it.

Mr. FREAR. I believe practically none. Let me say this in justification, that afterwards there was some commerce; they had a small amount of coal that came down the river.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I am not talking about that; I am talking about the commerce through the locks and dams.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; through the locks and dams. Notwithstanding the cumulative method of figuring which the engineers indulge in, it shows 279,000 tons that went through the locks, but that includes logs and everything of that kind.

I want to say that I am not taking the time of the House unnecessarily, because we have passed over a number of projects that I could have discussed, but did not care to unnecessarily take the time.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The point I am asking, and only for information, is as to the justification of this project. It was the hope, expectation, and belief that a great deal of coal would come down through these locks, and what I want to know is if as a matter of fact that has developed.

Mr. FREAR. No; because the Government could better afford to build a railroad and pay $50,000 a mile for it, and then get better results. As it stands to-day, with all this enormous expenditure, the waterway is practically useless unless the Government proceeds to put boats on it.

Now, we propose to give the railroads back to the individuals. I point to this because it has been mentioned in repeated arguments that here was a project, a good test for canalization, and so let us go on with this at any event. We have done that. In this bill is the canalization of the Cumberland River, in addition to the $7,000,000 that we have expended on that river. Now, without having established a successful case in a single instance, with possibly the exception of the Monongahela, they are going on with other projects. Now, take the amount expended for maintenance of locks, which must be borne by the Government, there is no return compared with the amount expended. The returns are insignificant.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Is the gentleman informed of the tonnage that went down that river in 1917?

Mr. FREAR. It says here that there were 580,000 tons.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is a pretty good tonnage, is it not?

Mr. FREAR. Four hundred and fifty-seven thousand tons in 1917, 580,000 tons the year before, and that contains the logs that floated down through and practically everything else besides. Here is a duplication as in the case of the Mississippi River. You have driven off the boats; you can not maintain the boats unless the Government gets behind them, including a cost up to this time of nearly $10,000,000. Now you ask the Government to make use of it. I do not blame the people of Alabama for wanting that; they want to make use of it; and what chance is there of doing so when the railroads can drive off water transportation unless the Government comes in and runs the boats?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman let me ask him another question?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Are these logs floated down the river?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. They could be floated down without the improvement. Here is a new project of $400,000 to increase the depth from 6 to 8 feet. In the floating of logs, as the gentleman can readily understand, that could not be considered.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No; I was interested in the canalization project and looked forward with a good deal of interest to see what the development would be when the canalization was completed. I was trying to find out after it was completed whether some substantial commerce had developed, and particularly whether or not there was a substantial commerce in coal.

Mr. FREAR. There was some. of course; the project, I learn, was completed three years ago; but I want to say that there has been expended more money there than in the Superior-Duluth Harbor, more than in that of Chicago, which had a tonnage of over 5,000,000 tons, and more than Milwaukee, with about 7,000,000 tons. Ashland, in my State, has 10,000,000 tons on an average each year, and here, with an expenditure of $10,000,000 you have got a couple hundred thousand tons, or something of that kind.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, can we have an understanding as to the length of debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto? How much time does the gentleman from Alabama want?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I want 10 minutes; not over that.

Mr. SMALL. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 14 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to close debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto in 14 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, let us find out whether or not the gentleman is correct. The gentleman says they are going to find a saving of $400,000 in freight rates every year after this canalization is completed. Now, we have spent substantially $10,000,000 on that river already and little traffic is there to speak of, and the interest on that taken out of the Government every year means $400,000, the full amount that he expects to save. But that is not the point. Two hundred and eleven thousand dollars was spent last year for lockage, for managing that canal, and that is in addition to the interest item. We are wasting money there. As I said, there was $600,000 last year it cost the Government on this river. Now, on top of all that we are going to put in a new appropriation—I do not think the gentleman has the right description as I have it here; it is 150 feet width of the river, and they want an 8-foot depth and now want $400.000 more. Two hundred thousand dollars contained in this bill will not go far on a $10,000,000 proposition. He and I agree in regard to railroads, but he says that shows the absurdity of my position. For 50 years we have been spending money and we have seen all the commerce on the upper Mississippi driven from that river after we spent $150,000,000. We have seen the commerce on the Missouri River driven away after we have spent $24,000,000, and I have raised my voice here time and again and these gentlemen have never given any attention to the subject until now. I say it is absurd to throw money away on the gentleman's stream or any other stream unless we prevent the railroads from driving that commerce away. Here we appreciate the fact that the Government itself, not a private individual, but the Government itself, is obliged to build the boats in order to make commerce possible on the Black Warrior.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, why is it my good friend [Mr. FREAR] seems to be living entirely in the past? He does not seem to realize we are preparing to do something big in the near future. He talks about what has been done upon the Warrior River and what has not been done. We are preparing to do something upon that river in the future, not trying to live altogether with the past and in the past. This great Government of ours is trying to do something with that river; in fact, has determined to do something with it. I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, in view of the fact that the Government is going to undertake to develop here river transportation, what has he to say about that? It is not simply the question of the river and the small commerce which has existed upon it in the past, but here the Government proposes to spend millions of dollars to bring millions of dollars' worth of the best coal in the world and the cheapest coal in the world to the peoples of the earth. What has the gentleman to say about that? Does he oppose it; does he oppose cheap rates for hauling coal? Is he in favor of the railroads monopolizing and taking possession of the transportation systems of the country? Is he to raise his hands and say, "We give up to the railroads; we are going to let them handle all the coal from the coal fields and levy an increased rate," or does he propose to unite with his Government and mine and yours in this great scheme to utilize this river and avoid the congestion and the shortage of cars, which condition existed a few months ago? Then we had cars all congested in one section of the country to the detriment of the other. We propose to open the channels of commerce everywhere. That is what they are doing to-day in France, and even in Germany they propose to do the same thing. They are not going to sit idly down and go to sleep. What is France doing—that great country? What is England doing? England has never stopped the development of her waterways, and neither has France. We helped them with their transportation problem during the war period. We have even sent our engineers over there in order that we might help that great country. They are not going to give up, although they have bled at every vein. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. All time has expired and, without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tombigbee River, Ala. and Miss.: For maintenance from mouth to Demopolis, Ala., $40,000, and from Demopolis, Ala., to Walkers Bridge, Miss., $2,500; in all, $42,500.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is part of the same system, so I think it properly comes under the same discussion. I wish to say this to the gentlemen from Alabama, who indulge in the specious argument that they have used here——

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman allow me to submit a request for unanimous consent? How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. FREAR. Five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. Now, Mr. Chairman, the people of this country have been liberal with waterways, with the South as well as with the North. My attention was just called to Ashtabula Harbor, where we have spent between two and three million dollars. We had about 16,000,000 tons of commerce last year. That is the kind of commerce we have. Now, these gentlemen who live upon rivers—and I live on the greatest river in the world, and it has no commerce, it is deserted—these gentlemen who live upon some of these rivers now say, "Let us canalize them and we will then proceed to show you what we can do." All right. Which river? The Black Warrior River has been held up time and again in the House of Representatives. All right. This Government has put in about $10,000,000 on the Black Warrior River. The interest item on that to the Government amounts to $400,000 a year and the cost of lockages to take care of it amounts to over $200,000, which makes over $600,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS rose.

Mr. FREAR. I can not yield to the gentleman until I get through with this statement. After we have finished that improvement—that is all they asked for, nothing more—that was going to establish the use of waterways and the use of all waterways. Now, what happened?

The small traffic has been practically driven off of that river the same as it has off of every other river, as was predicted. What happened? The gentleman from Alabama says we are living in the past. You have lived in the past, and the Government has financed you in the past, and it is financing you today, because you can not put a line of boats on that river yourselves. Gentlemen, you come to the Government, after we have given you all the money to complete the project, and ask us to put boats down there to help carry the coal down the river to you so that you can save a little money. This particular item is costing the Government $600,000 annually. There are other projects in this bill, like the Cumberland and others that are proposed to be started here, with the same hopeless situation that you have in this case. That is what I desire to call your attention to. It is continued waste and waste, and you can not close your eyes to it, because you have some project in the bill in which you are especially interested. It is there. And you can not read these engineers' reports without coming to that conclusion.

The gentleman refers to France and Germany. I have explained several times, and the gentleman knows, if he knows anything about transportation abroad, that Germany owns its railroads, and it discriminates in favor of the waterways. France has or has arranged to take over its railroads. But the gentlemen who talk loudest on this subject, I predict, are among those who will on this floor in a few days return the railroads to their owners. They have said I am speaking for the railroads. That is just what I am seeking to control. I say this: We are wasting money in enormous amounts, and we all know it. And here is an item which, after we have spent $12,000,000, has practically no commerce. Now, with the $600,000 annual tax on the people for maintenance, we are still without a boat line, and the Government has got to build one if the stream is utilized.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barataria Bay and Baycus Lafourche, Terrebonne, Grossetete, Plaquemine, and Teche, Louisiana: For maintenance, $20,000; for improvement of Barataria Bay in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 200, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $32,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands and easements required for the purpose of this improvement; for improvement of Bayou Teche in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1329, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $100,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands or easements required for the purpose of this improvement; in all, $152,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to get leave to extend my remarks?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit, how much time does he desire?

Mr. FREAR. Probably not over two or three minutes; at any rate, not over five.

Mr. SMALL. I ask that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This item calls for $315,000, I believe. It is not that amount in the bill. The total amount in this bill, as I understand, is $152,000 for a number of projects; but this item alone, when we get the project completed, will cost $315,000. What I want to say is this: We have spent $216,000 on this same project. At this time I can not understand why it is urged, except that different members of the committee are very glad to have their items in the bill. There may be some desire—and I presume there is—and a great deal of pressure at home. But I turn to page 7 of the report. I can not find it in the Engineers' Annual Report. But accepting this report, it says that three-fourths of all the commerce is saw logs. That is the kind of commerce mentioned here. Now, there is some commerce. I believe in cases, even on inland waters, that show a commerce there should be some help from the Government when the communities themselves are willing to help. But I do say, Mr. Chairman, that when we make a tax upon Sandusky Harbor, for instance, in this bill, and require them to make a contribution, and when we make a contribution condition on the harbor of Nawilliwilli, and other harbors that are handling real commerce, it does not seem right for us to dig down in the Treasury every time for some little or big project without insisting on a contribution being made. When they want flood control down on that river they contribute toward it. And then they say that they will pay a third of the cost. That is what they contribute, the people who are having their lands protected along the Mississippi.

If the people in Louisiana can do that in one case, why should they not do it in all cases? And Louisiana should not do it any more than any other place. I believe a contribution should be asked for. We are collecting that money from the sale of liberty bonds and by increased taxes. There is not any justification for this or many other items that I have passed by and did not take time to discuss.

A few moments ago we passed a stream. What was asked for in that case? Congress is asked to give a deeper channel for one boat. You may say that that could not be possible. Here it is right here, the Boca Ciega Bay project, in Florida. Let me read:

The St. Petersburg Transportation Co. is at the present time compelled to use a boat drawing 4 feet for the trips between Tampa and Passagrille. They are very anxious that an 8-foot channel be provided so that they can use one of their larger boats. The boat that they now use is the Manatee, which draws 4 feet. The boat that they desire to use is the Favorite. The Favorite would make daily trips between Passagrille, St. Petersburg, and Tampa.

Think of that kind of a project, and yet that is approved by the committee. I just passed that over without discussion. What is the use of raising these points that have been brought in from one end of the country to the other? These are frequently insignificant little items. This is one of them. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws his pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Atchafalaya River, La.: For maintenance, $30,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do this to call the attention of the House to an evident fraud that is being perpetrated on the families of soldiers. I received yesterday a communication from the wife, or, rather, the mother-in-law, of a soldier, written for the wife, the soldier being one of those in the famous "lost battalion" in the Argonne Forest, whose commander, Lieut. Col. Whittlesey, I am proud to say, is from Pittsfield, Mass. She sent me a circular letter, which I hold in my hand, anonymous in character, headed "The American Biography Publishers," a concern evidently endeavoring through misrepresentation to secure from the families of soldiers the sum of $1 to have the life account of the soldier appear in so-called publications of the American Biography Publishers.

I intend to take this matter up with the Post Office Department, because it seems to me it is a positive fraud and should not be permitted to be circulated through the mails. The circular calls attention to the fact that this soldier was on the casualty list, and asking for a dollar in order that his name might appear on the "honor roll" to be presented to the President of the United States. Think of such a circular as that going out to the families of our boys!

I at once made inquiry whether or not any casualty had occurred in this particular case, because the mother-in-law said that her daughter refused to believe that her husband is dead, having heard from him within a short time. I made inquiry at the War Department and found that there had been no such casualty; that the man had been slightly gassed in September, and assigned to duty at Tours on September 9, and wired the lady to that effect.

It seems to me that attention should be publicly called to such a circular letter as this, in order that the people of the country may not have the anguish of such solicitations from commercial circulars as the one to which I refer, and in order that proper publicity may be given to the matter I ask unanimous consent that these letters be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the printing of the letters referred to in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

Following are the letters referred to:

PITTSFIELD, JANUARY 7, 1919.

Hon. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: My daughter, Mrs. Charles B. Cornell, received the inclosed letter yesterday from the American Biography Publishers and in that way learned that her husband is dead—if such is the case. She refuses to believe it until she hears from Washington. The last letter she received from her husband was dated October 10, 1918, and in that letter he (Mr. Cornell) stated he had been in that lost battalion and had been sick ever since they were rescued. At the time of Mr. Cornell's enlistment he and his wife were living at 104 Concord Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. The soldier's address in the service was: Sergt. Charles B. Cornell, Company H, 308th Infantry.

Now, dear Congressman, I am sorry to trouble you so often on this case, but you have been so kind and considerate in helping my daughter to get what rightly belongs to her, namely, her allotment, that I again appeal to you to find out if possible if Mr. Cornell is dead or anything corncerning him.

Thanking you for your interest in my daughter's case and anxiously awaiting a reply,

Respectfully, yours,

MRS. WM. T. GUY.

AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY PUBLISHERS,
PUBLISHERS OF INDIVIDUAL HONOR ROLLS,
Hartford, Conn., December 19, 1918.

MRS. EVELYN CORNELL,
104 Concord Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.,
Nearest kin of Corpl. Charles B. Cornell.

DEAR FRIEND: Victory is ours. We have driven the last of the autocratic rulers from power and have given the peoples of the world an opportunity to enjoy the freedom which is ours. Once more America has fought in the cause of freedom, and our cause was expressed in the President's stirring address to Congress: "For the ultimate peace of the world and the liberation of all its peoples; for the rights of nations, great and small, and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience."

It is with deep regret we notice the name of your soldier boy in a recent casualty list. Although neither we nor anyone else can endeavor to offer you such consolation as will alleviate your sorrow, we feel sure that every person in your position harbors a great deal of pride in having offered a son, husband, brother, or relative to the noble cause for which the whole civilized world went to battle.

We desire to secure a short biography of his life to go into a book now being compiled by the American Biography Publishers, so that his name may live in history and go down in posterity. This book when completed will be presented to the President of the United States as a memorial to those who have fought in the cause of liberty and democracy.

To commemorate the deeds of your soldier boy, we have prepared an attractive honor roll, lithographed in a beautiful sepia on a high grade of paper, size 11 by 14 inches, artistically combining the different branches of the United States service, with the flags of the allies, topped by an eagle with outspread wings. This honor roll will be engrossed with the name and title of your soldier boy and other essential facts from his biography.

We are inclosing an information blank, which we ask you to kindly fill out and return to us with $1, for which we will send you the honor roll suitably engrossed, and also enter his biography in the book we are compiling.

You owe it to your soldier boy as well as to yourself to send us this information at once.

Respectfully, yours,

AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY PUBLISHERS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Waterway from the Mississippi River to the Sabine River, La.: For improvement from Mississippi River to Bayou Teche in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 610, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $100,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement, but this proviso shall not include the acquisition of the rights of any private canal which it might be to the interest of the United States to acquire; completing improvement of Vermilion River, La., and channel to connect the Vermilion River with the inland waterway from the Mississippi River to the Sabine River in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1336, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $37,500: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement; in all, $137,500.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask the chairman of the committee how much is involved in that first proposition; that is, Bayou Teche, Miss.? I am asking for information. On page 15 of the document it says $826,000. Is that the amount?

Mr. SMALL. That is one of the sections of the intercoastal waterway.

Mr. FREAR. That is the amount that is carried in this project?

Mr. SMALL. There are estimates, as the gentleman will see, for several depths. The depth adopted on this section was 5 feet and the estimated cost is $826,000.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I thought that was it, but I was not sure. I want to say in passing, Mr. Chairman, that we quietly sit here listening to the Clerk read these projects for $100,000, and so on, not knowing that here is an $826,000 project, a canal or waterway down there in Louisiana, that we are adopting. That is the fault of this kind of a bill. It does not give the country or the House the correct understanding of what is involved in the projects in amount or character. Eight or probably nine or ten times as much will be involved in this before the expenditures are finished as the amount in this bill, and it will never be completed as a 5-foot project, because the next item in an adjoining column, after we get the 5 and 7 foot project, will call for a 9 or 12 foot project. A good authority says, "You can not run any good commerce down there in Texas unless we have a 12-foot channel." No contribution is asked for from the local people. From $1,000,000 to several million dollars will be eventually expended for this section of the inland waterway down in Louisiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bayous Vermilion, Nezpique, des Cannes, Plaquemine Brule, and Queue de Tortue, Mermentau River, and Calcasieu River and Pass, La.: The project for Mermentau River and tributaries is hereby extended to include Bayou des Cannes as far up as the Evangeline Bridge in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1591, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. SMALL: Page 15, strike out the numerals "1591," at the beginning of line 7, and insert in lieu thereof "1398."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee why this item carries no appropriation?

Mr. SMALL. The reason for that is this: The report which is adopted here recommends that Bayou des Cannes be added to the project of the Mermentau or Nezpique River, so that it becomes part of that project, and any appropriations made therefor may be expended for this particular improvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Freeport Harbor, Tex.: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. SMALL: Page 15, strike out the period at the end of line 23, insert in lieu thereof a semicolon, and add the following: "for improvement, $5,000: Provided, That the project in this section may be extended at the discretion of the Secretary of War in accordance with so much of the report submitted in River and Harbor Committee Document No. 3, Sixty-third Congress, first session, as recommended the dredging of the channel across the bar at the mouth of the Colorado River; in all, $49,000."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to include in that project the dredging of the bar at the mouth of the Colorado River at an expense of $5,000. The amount of commerce involved seems to justify the improvement. I have a letter from the Chief of Engineers recommending this amendment, which I will not read but will insert the letter in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to insert in his remarks the letter referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

JANUARY 4, 1919.

HON. JOHN H. SMALL,
Chairman Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SMALL: 1. In reply to your letter of January 3, 1919, in reference to the improvement of the Colorado River, Tex., I have the honor to say that it appears from information furnished by Judge Mansfield that an important development has taken place near the mouth of this river, and that it is now desired that the improvement should be made simply across the bar at the mouth of the river, so as to afford access to the river; and it is now not deemed essential that the work above the mouth of the river, which also involved the principal part of the cost, should be undertaken.

2. The conditions recommended by the Chief of Engineers in River and Harbor Committee Document No. 3, Sixty-third Congress, first session, apply more particularly to the work above the mouth of the river than at the mouth of the river. It is understood that the condition which involved the construction of a railroad spur to mile 21 has been met by a railroad spur constructed into Matagorda near the mouth of the river. In view of the existing conditions, it does not seem necessary to make the dredging of the channel across the bar subject to the conditions, and it is suggested that the desired improvement could be brought about by amending the item found on page 15, lines 19–21, of the river and harbor bill, as introduced in the House of Representatives, to read substantially as follows:

"Waterway from Galveston to Corpus Christi and channel from Pass Cavallo to Port Lavaca, Tex., for maintenance, $44,000; for improvement, $5,000: Provided, That the project for this section may be extended at the discretion of the Secretary of War in accordance with so much of the report submitted in River and Harbor Committee Document No. 3, Sixty-third Congress, first session, as recommended the redredging of the channel across the bar at the mouth of the Colorado River; in all, $49,000."

Very truly, yours,

W. M. BLACK,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.
By H. TAYLOR,
Brigadier General, United States Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Red, Black, Ouachita, Tensas, Boeuf, and Saline Rivers, and Bayous Macon, Bartholomew, D'Arbonne, and Corney, Ark. and La.: For maintenance, $15,000; continuing improvement of Ouachita River in accordance with the report submitted in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 7, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, $300,000; in all, $315,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to speak for a moment on the Ouachita River.

This Government has already appropriated $4,389,369 for the Ouachita. After deducting the timber and sand that has been floated down the Ouachita we find 28,500 tons carried as actual commerce.

Reading from page 5 of the hearing before the committee on this project, a United States Senator from one of the States traversed by the Ouachita River came before the committee and he said:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is one of the best river and harbor projects in the United States, and it ought to be carried out in the same good faith with which it was undertaken and the same wise manner with which it was begun in 1902.

Let me state, by the way, that this Senator is at the head of a waterway organization in the United States. The chairman of our Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. SMALL] then said:

Senator, some of these rivers do not seem to have developed the commerce even where a moderate channel was provided. What is the probable effect on Congress if the Ouachita River is developed and the locks and dams completed?

Then the Senator states why there should be commerce, because, he says, there is so much commerce adjacent to both banks of the river. Then the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. SMALL] again says:

That does not always follow. There have been instances where there was a large commerce in the territory contiguous, and yet no water-borne commerce has developed, making it seem evident that the development of water-borne commerce is dependent upon the activities of the people in the sections contiguous.

Now, as I said, bearing in mind that we have already spent over $4,000,000 during a long period of years on this stream to secure 28,000 tons of commerce, I read from document No. 7, referred to here, which asks for $360,000 more; but, as I understand it, $300,000 is contained in the bill. I read from page 2:

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors believes that the plan proposed is feasible of execution, but that the commerce that could reasonably be expected to use this section of the river, aside from timber that does not require slack water, is not sufficient to justify the cost of the work. It therefore reports that the modified plan is feasible, but not commercially advisable. If, however, Congress decides that it is advisable to continue the improvement and carry slack water up to Camden, the board recommends that the modified plan proposed by the district engineer be adopted rather than the construction of Locks and Dams Nos. 7 and 9.

If then Congress, like the Rivers and Harbors Committee, decides that it is advisable to continue the improvement, the board recommends the adoption of the modified plan. Then the Chief of Engineers says:

After due consideration of the information presented, I concur in the views of the board.

Mr. Chairman, I could present facts in reference to this Ouachita River which it would take an hour to read, but I will simply read from page 4 of House Document 979, a report on a reexamination of the Ouachita River:

The present commerce, consisting largely of timber products, is not extensive, and owing to the character of the adjacent country, which is devoid of large commercial, mining, or manufacturing industries, the river traffic can not reasonably be expected to assume the magnitude considered essential to warrant the construction and maintenance of an expensive system of locks and dams. The question is now complicated, however, by the work already done, and it must be decided to what extent the unexecuted portion of the project should be continued or abandoned.

And the Army engineers all the way through their report suggest the abandonment of the project. They would do it if they could, because, as in the case of the Black Warrior River, you have a case of a very large expenditure with a very insignificant return in the way of commerce. That is one of many similar projects contained in this bill for which we are to pay by the sale of liberty bonds. What excuse can be offered for such expenditures?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to and including the mouth of the Missouri River: For maintenance, $700,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is a 200-mile stretch of the Mississippi River on which the Government thus far has spent over $18,000,000.

Mr. SMALL. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. FREAR. Only five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I should like at least five minutes, and possibly a few minutes more.

Mr. SMALL. Will five minutes be sufficient for the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. FREAR. I can get in on the next item.

Mr. SMALL. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes, the gentleman from Wisconsin to have five minutes, the gentleman from Iowa five minutes——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Make it seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa seven minutes and the chairman three minutes. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, after an expenditure of over $18,000,000, or an appropriation of $18,466,000, upon this 200-mile stretch of the Mississippi River, we have only a very small amount of traffic, of which I believe the largest item is garbage hauled from the city of St. Louis. This stretch of the river receives, at this rate, $3,500 a mile.

The next item which you are coming to on the Mississippi River receives $350 per mile. In other words, this lower part of the river, which is deeper and more navigable, if depth amounts to anything, receives ten times as much per mile as the upper part. Now, what was the purpose of the Army engineers in insisting on this large increase in the appropriation that we have here, after the tremendous expenditure which has already been made? There is in the hands of the Army engineers a balance of $370,000 available, in addition to this $700,000 proposed. What are they doing on the river? What have we accomplished there in the nature of traffic? There is a small traffic, but the only place, outside of the lower Mississippi River, where the Government is trying to-day to establish evidence that the Mississippi River is commercially successful is on the upper river, where the committee has given $350 a mile. The amount given the 200-mile stretch of $700,000, in addition to the large appropriations in the past, seems beyond reason. Now, what is the proposition you have there? I will read from page 48 of the hearings on inland transportation.

Mr. Goltra, chairman of the Democratic State committee of Missouri, has been receiving contracts, according to his statement, of $3,600,000; and this is established in the record here in the Engineers' Report, although it does not give his name—for carrying ore on the upper river from St. Paul down to St. Louis to his factory and furnaces. He says he is going to help commerce by taking coal back from the Illinois fields. Here is his proposition to the Government, page 48. He says that the cost per ton per mile for the fleet will be $1,700,000, that it has cost the Government $3,360,000, and that that money will cost him 6 per cent per annum on $283,000. And then he proceeds to determine how he can make it successful at that capitalization. The Government has to pay double that amount—$3,600,000—and you propose on the upper part of the river to expend $250,000 and $700,000 for the stretch from St. Louis down to the mouth.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think it is time that we looked at these projects in a sensible and reasonable light. When we consider the transportation on rivers the first question ought to be whether products can be carried more cheaply than by rail if the improvement is made, and whether this transportation will be desired. If we can answer those questions in reference to the Mississippi River we will solve them in favor of the appropriation.

There is no question in the mind of any engineer but what the Mississippi River could for a reasonable sum be fitted to carry heavy products like coal, iron, and grain at a very reasonable and low rate, probably one-half of what the railroads charge. There is no question but what the products are waiting to be carried and would be offered if the river channel was such that they could be carried by large barges and the boats were there.

What is the trouble? The gentleman from Wisconsin is right in one respect. The trouble is that as soon as we get the river in shape and get boats ready to carry the grain and ore the railroads make a reduced freight rate, so low that the boats are driven off the river. Then we come back to the question why have we no boats? Because no one will construct boats knowing that they will be driven off the river by a lower rate. We have no terminals. Why? People will not construct terminals if terminals are to be made useless by lower freight rates made by the railroads.

Another thing, we do not have suitable control over the railroads so that they are made to connect with water routes. How long is it going to be before the American people will wake up to this state of things? My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] thinks this condition is going to last as long as the Nation endures. I do not think it will. I think the people have reached the time when they will stop this practice. The present rail rates are a great burden on business, and there is no prospect that they will be lowered. On the contrary, they are being raised every day.

I remember when a small boy a canal from Chicago to La Salle that did a large business. It was operated at a very low rate, but after the railroad was constructed beside it it carried freight at one-quarter of the rate that it hauled it for the same distance elsewhere. Of course, the people at a distance were made to pay the difference. They were compelled to pay the railroad what it lost on this stretch lying parallel with the canal, and so the canal was driven out of business. It now lies idle, its boats are rotting, its channel out of repair. The people living near by could not ship on it if they would.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. My recollection is that Mr. Goltra said that give him the fleet that he wanted, and he could carry the ore from Minnesota down to St. Louis in competition with any rates that the railroads might make if sufficient money was appropriated to dredge the upper river, and he said that there was sufficient money appropriated to keep the water in proper condition from St. Louis to St. Paul.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman is correct, but I am talking about water transportation in general and the propriety of making use of it in this country. Every gentleman in this House knows that the heavy freight in Europe is carried largely by water. It ought to be carried largely by water in this country; but it is not, for the railroads are permitted to use a system which would ruin anybody who undertakes to compete by water. They can not compete with the rates which the railroads are willing to make. The gentleman from Wisconsin says that if the railroads come back into private control the same system will be kept up. I have no doubt it will be if the railroad managers absolutely control the matter, but I do not believe the American people will longer put up with that situation. They ought not to; there is no reason why they should, and I do not believe they will. In fact it will be our fault if they are compelled to endure it.

Recently, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] called attention, the Erie Canal was revived, and it was proposed to carry freight at a lower rate than the railroads which paralleled it. For some reason the Director General of Railroads made an order that it should not carry freight at a less rate than the railroads, and thereby limited its capacity and prevented it from carrying any great amount of freight for the reason that the transfer charges would increase the amount necessary to be paid, so that the freight after all was greater than by rail.

Out there in the same State of Illinois we also have another canal called the Hennepin Canal, which has been characterized as one of the greatest failures that ever existed in this country. It was well constructed and is in good condition this day. It was thought that it would do a great business, but it is a failure, so far as commerce upon it is concerned. It cost about $7,000,000, and it has often been said that this great sum was wasted, because the traffic upon it is insignificant. Yet it runs through one of the most fertile sections of this country and connects the Illinois River with the Mississippi. Paralleling it at a short distance are great trunk lines of railways which have more business offered them than they can properly care for. An immense tonnage of coal, grain, and merchandise passes by the same as if it had never been constructed.

What is the reason? Why does it do no business, passing, as it does, through the most fertile section of the whole United States? The reason is that it has no connection with the railroads at the beginning or end. It practically has no terminals. It was built to connect with the canal I first mentioned, but before completion the railroads had ruined the other, and it was in no condition for traffic. The Hennepin Canal might just as well run from nowhere to nowhere as to be in that situation, because without terminals and without the railroads being compelled to turn over to it the freight on reasonable conditions it could not get the freight.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. There are two minutes remaining in control of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Iowa like the remaining two minutes?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. I yield them to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. At the eastern end of this canal there are located within a very few miles some of the greatest coal mines in the country, and if that coal could be gotten down to the canal at any reasonable cost—and there is no reason why it should not, except that the railroads would not transport it at any reasonable price, and because there are no terminal facilities to handle it—the canal would do an enormous business in coal alone, provided there were terminals at the other end. In the other direction the world's garden spot—my own State—could furnish millions of bushels of grain to be carried eastward. But there is no way to get grain to the canal, and people hesitate to build terminals under such circumstances. They realize that the railroad would soon take the business away from the canal if the traffic was created. What, then, is the solution of the problem which arises? I answer that if we are to make this water traffic successful, if we are to justify these expenses, we must necessarily follow this legislation with other legislation when the proper time comes, when the question of the railroads going back to private control or the question of their remaining in public control comes before us, and then we must make provisions for the construction of terminals, we must provide that railroads shall not so lower their rates as to drive transportation from the rivers and the canal. In that way we will build up in this country, as we ought to have built up long ago, a great water-borne commerce, by which this heavy freight, the thousands of tons of iron and coal and grain that now clog our railroads and absorb our transportation systems, may be handled at the cheapest and lowest rates every known. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Mississippi River from the mouth of the Missouri River to Minneapolis, Minn.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $250,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I can agree, and I presume the House will agree, with practically all that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] has just said. We are all agreed, providing you will utilize these rivers. I might be presumed to be more interested in the upper Mississippi River traffic than any other proposition that can be found, because it goes by my district, but it has no traffic. There is going to be no traffic there unless you do something to occasion it. The gentleman says, let us go on and look after the railroads. We have this same argument made year after year on the floor of the House. We are always going to do something with the railroads. What have we ever done? What proposition has ever come? Now comes the proposition of giving the railroads back to private individuals. Why not make minimum rates so as to prevent localities from having the especial advantages they have now? The favored localities will not stand for that. How are you going to prevent this railroad discrimination which drives traffic from the river? I believe we ought to, and we could do it if we did it like Germany or France, or other countries do, but we gag a little at that proposition. Mr. McAdoo said a few days ago that unless you continue the five-year proposition to control the railroads all of this money that is being put into the waterways is wasted; that is, for these barges and boats that are being built. On page 1158 of the 1918 Engineer's Report we find the statement that in view of the overtaxed condition of railroad transportation and the proposed greater utilization of rivers to relieve the railroads, the board of trustees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation have authorized the expenditure of $3,600,000 for the construction of 4 river towboats and 24 river barges for carrying iron ore, coal, and oil on the Mississippi River. That is the Goltra contract for his steel concern. That is the statement of the Army engineers. My statement was questioned a moment ago. It does not mention Mr. Goltra, but it mentions him here in the other report. He is going to get this for his private business project. It is not for the public at large, but he gets it for his own use. The gentleman referred to the Minneapolis project, which requires only $6,000. It appears the Army engineers make this statement on that project, that it is improbable—and I think that is the term, "improbable," they use—that any use of this river can be established for traffic in coal. They were expecting it, of course, for the use of coal alone. Whether Mr. Goltra can make a success of it or not the country does not know, but we are going at this effort only piecemeal, a little here and a little there, in experiments, and we are putting an enormous sum of money into the Mississippi River—$150,000,000, as I said, in the Mississippi River. Let us control the railroads. Let us say to them, "You can not drive this water traffic off," as they do in other countries. Why not do that? You have never heard such a proposition coming on the floor of this House. I hope it will come, and if all this agitation will result in something like that, so that we will increase the river transportation, it will be time for congratulations.

The gentleman spoke of the Hennepin Canal. We have spent $7,566,000 for the Hennepin Canal. What is its traffic? About 5,000 tons. That is to be found on page 2729 of the report. I refer to it immediately because I remember that canal. We have got to do more than talk on the floor of the House. We have got to do something in the form of actual legislation; and the gentleman, I know, feels with me that it is time we do something to cause these rivers to be used or else stop appropriations. That is why I say we are appropriating $700,000 for the lower reach of the river when it does not need it. It seems to me that the Government is taking the chances in Goltra's case without anything to protect it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKENZIE: In line 12, page 17, after the figures "$250,000," insert the following:

"Provided, That not to exceed the sum of $5,000 of said money may be expended in the raising of the wing dam used as a ferry landing at Fulton, Ill., said improvement to be made with the approval and under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers."

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up the time of the committee to discuss this amendment. I understand that the chairman of the committee and the other members to whom I have submitted it have no objection to it, and therefore I feel that it would be an imposition upon the committee at this time to make a speech. I ask for a vote.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman state the extent to which it has the approval of the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I will make this statement, and I presume, in justice to the Chief of Engineers, I ought to make it. This is a matter that came to my attention very recently. The purpose of it is to raise the wing dam that was constructed in the river some years ago for the purpose of controlling the channel and deepening it at that point for a depth of 6 feet. Since that time this wing dam, or rather the river, has filled up to such an extent that the teams can not get out to the end which is the ferry landing at certain seasons of the year—the ferry landing is at this point, as I understand it—when the water is low, and it is necessary to have this raised. It has not been generally customary for the War Department to make these improvements, unless there was some special authorization of Congress, and I submitted this matter only this morning to the Chief of Engineers, Gen. Taylor, and he said that he could not give a written approval as to the project or the amendment, not having had any investigation made, but that if Congress saw fit to do this, of course they would carry out the direction of Congress. I want simply to say this, gentlemen of the committee, that this does not increase the appropriation. It simply provides that out of the sum of $250,000 for the improvement of this stretch of the Mississippi that not to exceed $5,000 of it shall be used for the purpose of raising this wing dam, so as to have this saving to the people of the city of Fulton. That is all there is in the amendment.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the committee accepts the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing that address which I delivered in New York on the railroad problem.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Missouri River: For maintenance and continuing improvement with a view to securing a permanent 6-foot channel between Kansas City, Kans., from the upper end of Quindaro Bend, and the mouth of the river, $400,000; for maintenance between Kansas City and Sioux City, $10,000; in all, $410,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I observe that only $10,000—I have not the item right before me, but I so understood the Clerk to read it—is allowed for the maintenance from Kansas City to Sioux City, a distance of several hundred miles. Is there any unexpended balance there or is that all that is intended to be allowed?

Mr. SMALL. About $37,000 is on hand. The Chief of Engineers reports that with this appropriation and the available balance the work contemplated can be carried out.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, I think possibly that is so, but I was not aware of this unexpended balance in that amount. I still think that is pretty small, because you must remember that river takes very quick movement along that stretch of towns and threatens not only existing channels but existing towns in its changes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The stretch of river of which the gentleman from Iowa was just speaking carried last year 6,000 tons 30 miles. I have forgotten the exact amount we have spent on it, but we have spent on the Missouri River $22,923,359. This 400-mile project has had $16,913,000, and we are going to expend $12,200,000 more in order to complete this project on the river. The commerce——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman is getting to be very enthusiastic as to rivers this year. It is all right, but I wish to make my statement first, then I will yield. The commerce on this river, after deducting sand, all 1 mile, was 14,436 tons. Think of it? Now, let me read from the report of the Army engineer on this and see what he has to say about it only three years ago. I will read from page 12 of the Engineer's report, from Herbert Deakyne, lieutenant colonel, Corps of Engineers. He says:

From the foregoing considerations I am of the opinion that the present and reasonably prospective commerce on the Missouri River between Kansas City and the mouth is not sufficient to warrant the continuance of the present project. I think the snagging should be continued, so that commerce may have the advantage of the natural depth of the river and the river shall not be allowed to become entirely obstructed. Any attempt at partial improvement seems futile, because the draft of boats, and therefore their cargoes, will be determined by the least existing depth. If the river is improved at all, the work should be complete as to protection of banks and control of channel.

He recommends $40,000 a year. Following that let me read from Col. Townsend, who is the head of the Mississippi River improvement, on page 13, where he says:

Instead of scattering appropriations over the entire western territory, a channel of 8 or 9 feet depth should first be provided from Chicago to New Orleans and the offer of assistance in the construction of a canal along the Des Plaines River from the State of Illinois accepted. An opportunity should then be afforded the American people to determine whether they want highways, not by rhetorical efforts in river conventions, but by a practical utilization of the channel thus afforded.

Listen to this, please. Here is the engineer's report:

An opportunity should then be afforded the American people to determine whether they want waterways, not by rhetorical efforts in river conventions, but by a practical utilization of the channel thus afforded. Until such revival occurs appropriations on the tributaries should be confined to maintaining the existing status.

He recommends $150,000 for the appropriation for snagging, and, of course, he was overridden. As Gen. Taylor said to the committee, when he went up the river he saw the boat line there, and he said the board decided if those people were willing to make some investment we ought to do something for it. So the board overruled the engineer. Then this boat line was taken off the river.

I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] for a question, because I imagine what is coming.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think the gentleman is as good a mind reader as that. I do not think he should get up here and say that he assumes that I would support a certain project which he mentions, when I was supporting a project from Kansas City to Sioux City. It is for simply maintaining the banks.

Mr. FREAR. We have got 6,000 tons of commerce there after all the years of improvement on the upper part.

Let me say this, that, according to the report, early in the fall the company laid up the boats for the winter, and that is the time that we had the 14,000 tons of commerce. We have spent $22,000,000 on the Missouri River. This bill carries $400,000 more.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SMALL. If the gentleman will permit me, how much time does the gentleman from Indiana desire?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Can not the gentleman conclude in five?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. All right. I will extend my remarks.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be consumed by the gentleman from Indiana and 5 minutes by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentlemen of the committee to a memorial which I expect every Member of Congress has received. I am prompted to do this by much that has been said in argument here concerning the value of these canals and waterways, and concerning what has been said about their being of no use because the railroads of this country have prevented their being made useful by the controlling of their rates, and so forth.

The State of New York, with considerable vision at the time when the canals of other States were being abandoned, saw to it that their canals were preserved. It took them over. They became a part of the property of the State. The State of New York has expended $429,000,000 in keeping them up, has made their use absolutely free, not only to the citizens of the State of

New York but also to anyone else that desires to use them. When this war broke out the State of New York, having control of these canals and thinking to do the patriotic thing, tendered them to the Government. The tender was accepted; but instead of their being used as it was intended they should be used, to relieve the congested condition then existing and which has since existed, they were absolutely rendered useless by reason of the fact that the Director General of Railroads prevented their being used for carrying any character of freight, especially to the West. And when a committee from the State of New York came here to ascertain why he had taken that action he said it was because "they would fix any kind of an old rate" in carrying their freight to the West, and it would materially interfere with the receipts that the railroads ought to receive for carrying this freight.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will pardon me, in carrying grain to the East.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And also in carrying grain to the East.

Now, the result of that has been that these canals are not being used, because the Director General still insists upon controlling them, and he still insists on prohibiting the carrying of freight there. It has resulted, if you please, not only in the people being prevented from getting their freight as they otherwise would have gotten it, and were getting it before, along the line of these canals, resulting in great hardship in many places, but where they are getting it by means of the railroads they are being compelled to pay largely excess rates. And one instance is given where the people along the upper end of some of these canals are being compelled now to pay a dollar a ton more for their coal that is delivered upon the railroad than they would be compelled to pay for it if it were permitted to be delivered by these canals.

This is a very instructive memorial. It is addressed to the Congress of the United States, it is addressed to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it is addressed, if you please, to the Director General of Railroads himself, and it is praying the Congress of the United States for relief against this condition. It occurs to me, gentlemen, that this is a good time for this to be brought to the consideration of every Member of this Congress, and in order that it may be had in detail and read by the Members in detail I ask to extend my remarks by making this memorial a part of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing the memorial referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is a copy of the memorial referred to:

NEW YORK'S CANALS.

A statement and memorial addressed to the Congress of the United States, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the United States Railroad Administration, the governor of the State of New York, the Legislature of the State of New York, the Public Service Commission of the second district of New York.

For nearly a century the canals of New York State have contributed in a substantial measure to the prosperity of the whole country.

VAST EXPENDITURES BY NEW YORK.

Since the inception of the Erie Canal in 1810 the State of New York has expended for these canals the sum of $429,800,000 entirely from its own resources. Of this sum it has expended $154,800,000 since 1903 in order to rehabilitate the canals as an efficient factor in transportation.

These canals when thus rehabilitated and modernized were officially opened to commerce in the month of May, 1918.

USE OF CANALS FREE.

They were offered by the State free of tolls or any charge whatever for the use of commerce to anyone; any firm or corporation, except the railroads, to operate boats upon them to carry their own property or the property of others. This privilege was made as free to the people, the boats, and the freight of all other States as it was to the people of New York and their freight.

MILLIONS OF TONS OF FREIGHT.

In August, 1917, after the United States entered the war, the governor and the Legislature of the State of New York invited the United States Government to use these canals to relieve the congestion upon the railroads and to transport supplies to the seaboard for the Government and its allies. If preparation had been made by promptly building the necessary boats, millions of tons of freight could have been carried upon these canals during the season of 1918.

The Federal Government made no such preparation, but in May, 1918, took over the operation of navigation upon these canals as a war measure.

KILLED CANAL LINES, THEN REFUSED FREIGHT.

The Railroad Administration having no boats set about to acquire the control of the usable boats which had been operated upon the canals. The boats of transportation lines which had been operating upon these canals for many years were taken and such lines were driven out of business. The freight which had been waiting transportation by these lines, with the exception of one line, was refused, and the boats were sent empty to Buffalo.

CANAL COMPETITION STOPPED.

The Director General's explanation of this procedure to a committee of New York State business men in Washington on the morning of Friday, October 25, 1918, was that the Railroad Administration had made some calculations of the effect that would be produced by taking the freight west in these boats "at any old rate," which meant the lower canal rate, and it had been decided best to send the boats empty, because if the freight was carried by canal the railroad revenues would be reduced.

CANALS WERE TO MAINTAIN COMPETITION.

The purpose of New York in constructing, enlarging, maintaining, and operating these canals was to provide a means of transportation for all kinds of merchandise and other freight, all of which could be carried cheaper and quicker by water than by rail. It was the purpose to give the business interests and industries of the country the benefit of the lower freight rate and the benefits which would be derived from canal competition.

RAILROADS NOT PERMITTED TO OPERATE BOATS.

The State of New York, in order to insure such competition, enacted a law on June 9, 1917, known as the "Interchange of traffic act" (chap. 805 of the Laws of 1917), which prohibited railroads operating boats upon the canals. This law was enacted because it was foreseen that if railroads were permitted to operate boats upon the canals, backed by the capital of the railroads, they would discourage private enterprise and private capital would not venture to build and operate boats upon the canals and measure strength in an unequal battle with the prepondering capital of the trunk lines of railroad when also operating boats on the canal.

RAILROAD CONTROL OF CANALS FEARED.

It was foreseen that if railroads were permitted to operate boats upon these canals the railroads would dominate and drive the smaller independent canal carrier off the canals and control canal rates. It was foreseen, also, that the rates on the canals would then cease to be competitive with rail rates, and the canals, under these circumstances, would be of no real value to this State or other States in fostering their commerce and manufactures, and the vast sums of money expended upon these canals would be wasted.

PANAMA CANAL DENIED TO RAILROAD SHIPS.

This policy of the State of New York in preventing the railroads from operating boats upon the New York canals was previously adopted by the Congress of the United States with respect to the Panama Canal.

When the Panama Canal was nearing completion it was seen that if railroads were permitted to operate steamship lines through the Panama Canal the railroad-owned ships would ultimately drive off all other ships and dominate that canal, and then, being without competition, would make the freight rates thereon so as to nullify all of its advantages as a route of cheap transportation between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the country, and the Panama Canal would not then be in any degree a regulator of transcontinental rail rates.

Congress in the Panama Canal act passed August 24, 1912, therefore, prohibited railroad-owned steamships from using the Panama Canal.

CONGRESS FOSTERS WATER LINES.

Moreover, in the same act Congress amended the interstate commerce act and gave the Interstate Commerce Commission full power to compel the interchange of traffic everywhere throughout the country between rail lines and water lines on through shipments, to make through rates via rail and water lines on through bills of lading, to declare the proper division of such rates to which the rail and water carriers would be entitled on such shipments, and to compel the making of physical connections between rail lines and water lines, and to assess the cost of same equitably upon such lines.

POLICY OF CONGRESS NULLIFIED BY RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION.

It was clearly the policy of Congress, as expressed in this law, to encourage transportation by water lines, to insure competition between rail and water lines, and to prevent the railroads from throttling water competition. This act has not been repealed and it is now the law, although wholly nullified by the United States Railroad Administration acting under the power it has assumed to possess over transportation given it as a war measure.

CANALS CONSIGNED TO DISUSE.

The State of New York invited the United States Government to use the canals to their maximum capacity. The United States Railroad Administration assumed the control of navigation upon these canals and then diverted the normal traffic from them to the railroads. The Director General's explanation that to use the canals would reduce railroad revenues does not justify taking them under his control and then adopting a policy consigning them to disuse.

INCREASED THE COST OF COAL.

The New York superintendent of public works recently stated that coal transported to northern New York and Canada during the past season has been carried by railroads paralleling the Champlain Canal at a cost of a dollar per ton more to the consumer than if carried by the canal, where necessary boats were available but consigned to idleness. The tonnage carried on the Erie Canal during the season of 1918 has been smaller than in any year since 1826, when the original canal was opened.

TRANSPORTATION SYSTEMS TO SERVE PUBLIC.

In its report issued December 1, 1918, the Interstate Commerce Commission, in discussing the policy which should be pursued, said: "Whatever line of policy is determined upon, the fundamental aim or purpose should be to secure transportation systems that will be adequate for the Nation's needs even in time of national stress or peril, and that will furnish to the public safe, adequate, and efficient transportation at the lowest cost consistent with that service. To this end there should be provision for * * * development and encouragement of inland waterways and coordination of rail and water transportation systems." In other words, our transportation systems should be operated to serve the public and not primarily to enhance corporate revenues.

CONGRESS APPROVED COMPETITIVE PRINCIPLE.

In a communication to Congress December 5, 1917, the Interstate Commerce Commission also said: "The railroads of the country came into being under the stimulus of competition. From the outset their operation and development have been responsive to a competition which has grown with the growth of population and industry. This competitive influence has been jealously guarded and fostered by State laws and constitutions as well as by the Federal law. * * * Congress, accepting the competitive principle as salutary, has thrown about it prohibitions against compacts, etc., * * * and, while the original act is but the nucleus of the act we now administer, that prohibition has remained unchanged."

NEW YORK SUPPLEMENTS NATIONAL POLICY.

The purpose of the State of New York in constructing and maintaining her canals, therefore, has been in entire harmony with a long-established national policy and supplemental to such national policy.

CANALS A BOON TO WHOLE COUNTRY.

Many people outside of New York do not yet understand either the motives of New York or the value of these canals to the country at large. They have assumed that the vast expenditures made by New York for her canals were made from purely selfish motives. This is not a correct view; for, while New York, along with the other States, has been greatly benefited by these canals and expects to be benefited by them in the future, New York knows that she has conferred a boon of inestimable value upon the whole country.

INFLUENCE OF NEW YORK'S CANALS.

Relating to the influence of New York's canals, nothing more convincing should be needed than the testimony of Mr. Albert Fink, some time commissioner for the several trunk lines of railroad, and the testimony of Mr. George R. Blanchard, some time vice president of the Erie Railroad Co., the most eminent railroad authorities of their time.

Mr. Blanchard (testimony, p. 2840, New York Assembly Document No. 38, 1880) said:

"The State holds within its grasp the great controller of the freight rate within its borders, to wit, the canal; there is not a town that is not affected more or less within this whole State, from the extreme northeast to the extreme southwest corner of it, by the canal policy and rates of this State. Every rate we make to or from Buffalo in competition with the Erie Canal has more or less influence to every point this side of Buffalo. * * *

"I might use an illustration upon the west end of our line, for instance, Salamanca, upon the Dunkirk division; the rate to that point is limited by the canal rates and the rates upon Lake Erie to Dunkirk, plus the railroad rate back to Salamanca, which is not upon the line of the canal; it is remote from it; it is upon the southern border, but we are limited to the lower of the rates I have cited. Still further, if the canal makes a rate to Buffalo, and if we make the rate to Buffalo to compete with the canal, the rate being only 3 cents per 100 pounds more to stations on our western division by the tariff I have submitted than to Buffalo, the rate immediately falls down to within 3 cents of the Buffalo rate which is made by the canal, and in this way the canal influences our rates where it does not limit them."

REGULATES THE RATES OF THE WHOLE COUNTRY.

Mr. Fink (testimony, p. 530, New York Assembly Doc. No. 38, 1880) said:

"That whenever a reduction is made in the rail rate from Chicago to New York, occasioned by lake and canal competition, that that reduction extends to Louisville, Nashville, and Savannah.

"It extends to every point of the country, I might say; to-day, when they charge 10 cents or 12 cents a hundred from Chicago to New York, the steamship lines from here to Savannah take up that freight and carry it for 15 cents from here to Savannah, making a rate from Chicago to Savannah of 25 cents; the regular rate from Chicago to Savannah by railroads may be at the same time 50, 60, 70, or 80 cents; they have to come down and conform to the water rate; the rate in Savannah determines again the rate in Atlanta; Atlanta is perhaps the most interior of all towns in the country, and generally gets the highest rates on that account; they carry their freight for nothing, from Chicago to New York almost, and then from here by water to Savannah and then carry the short distance from Savannah up to Atlanta themselves—that is 200 miles—and the other rail lines that work from Chicago to Nashville, Louisville, Chattanooga, and Atlanta have simply to conform to the rates that the steamship lines and the rail lines from Chicago and New York make; thus the lake navigation and canal navigation regulate the rates of the whole country, you may say, from Canada down to the Gulf."

2,000 MILES INLAND VIA ERIE CANAL.

It must be borne in mind that the New York canals, extending across the State of New York from the Hudson River to the Great Lakes, complete the link in water transportation extending nearly 2,000 miles inland from the Atlantic Ocean toward the Pacific coast, so that the vast territory of the United States, even west of the Mississippi River, is advantageously affected by the transportation of the Erie Canal.

AN AMAZING FACT.

This may be seen by a single illustration. Lumber from the northwest Pacific coast, under normal conditions, may be carried by ship via the Panama Canal to New York and thence via the Hudson River, Erie Canal, and Great Lakes, and thence via rail points on an average of 500 miles west of the Mississippi River before the cost of such transportation will equal the cost via rail direct from the Pacific coast to the same points.

THE CANALS PARALYZED.

Notwithstanding these inestimable advantages of the New York canals to the whole country we have seen them during the past season paralyzed and rendered almost useless in order that railroad revenues should be increased.

THE FATAL STROKE OF A PEN.

To accomplish this practical destruction of water competition, if it could have been done unaided by the Railroad Administration, would have cost the railroads many millions of dollars by reducing their rates to a destructively competitive basis, or low enough to drive the canals out of business. But this could not have been done without also bankrupting the competing railroads. It has been done without loss to the railroads, and, so to speak, by the stroke of the pen of the Director General of Railroads, when he adopted the policy and signed the order to route all freight by railroad that the rails could carry. It was done when the Director General of Railroads adopted the policy that freight should not be routed via the canal because, as he explains, it would disorganize the railroad tariffs of the country and reduce railroad revenues. The paralysis of the canals was made doubly sure when canal rates were placed upon and maintained at a practical parity with rail rates.

ROUTES ALL FREIGHT VIA RAIL.

It was manifestly an utterly empty assurance which the Director General of Railroads gave to the business men of the State of New York on the 25th of last October, in Washington, that anyone may put boats upon the canals and operate them with full confidence that the Railroad Administration would not interfere with their operation or their rates, and when he guaranteed that such boats would not be commandeered. It will be seen at once that having the power to route all freight via rail, and exercising that power, there would be no disturbances of rail rates through canal competition and no reduction of railroad revenues, for there would be no freight for canal boats to carry and no boats to carry it.

RAILROAD DOMINATION OF CANALS REALIZED.

It will also be seen how all of the dangers which were foreseen from railroad domination of the canals, hereinbefore referred to, have been realized to their fullest extent by the domination of the canals by the railroads through the arbitrary intervention of the United States Railroad Administration.

COUNTRY-WIDE DEVELOPMENTS BLIGHTED.

The Railroad Administration has thus arbitrarily reversed policies and principles long time established by wisdom, honored by consent, pledged by custom, and confirmed and guaranteed by the laws of the United States and of the separate States, upon the supposed permanence and inviolability of which stupendous industrial investments have been based, made, and progressively enlarged, and from which unparalleled developments have resulted throughout the country, now to be blighted or destroyed.

It is not conceivable that Congress ever intended to confer the power upon the Railroad Administration to so arbitrarily and effectually destroy water competition, or that Congress did ever consent to the paralyzing of one of the chief lines of water transportation in order that railroad revenues should be increased. The Panama Canal act of recent enactment, herein referred to, provided means to perpetuate and insure water competition, and Congress in recent years has been exceedingly generous in the appropriations made for rivers and harbors.

EXCEEDED POWER CONFERRED.

It is clear that the power exercised by the Railroad Administration to route all freight at will was not intended to apply to water lines and to permit the diversion of freight from water lines. It is clear that Congress did not contemplate or intend that the power to route freight should apply to freight intended by the shipper for water lines, or that such power should be so exercised as to prevent a shipper using a water line if he desired to do so. It is not conceivable that Congress intended to sanction the arbitrary routing of coal to northern New York and Canada by railroad at a cost of $1 per ton more to the consumer than if routed by a paralleling canal when idle boats were available.

CONGRESS INTENDED TO RELIEVE RAILROADS.

The act was passed by Congress at a time when the railroads of the country were badly congested and freight was awaiting transportation, when the industries of the country were being sadly hampered thereby and the supplies for the armies and peoples of our allies were being delayed; and, moreover, it was necessary to prepare the railroads at once to quickly transport our own troops and the supplies intended for them abroad and for the many camps and cantonments in this country. Manifestly, Congress did not intend that, under such conditions, the law it passed should be so construed that freight intended for water lines would be arbitrarily shunted on to these railroads, the congestion of which Congress intended the law to relieve.

ARBITRARY WAR POWERS NO LONGER NECESSARY.

The war is now over, and the exercise of these arbitrary war powers is no longer necessary and should no longer be indulged or permitted by the Railroad Administration whatever its motives or explanations may have been.

WAR POWERS WOULD CONTINUE TO PARALYZE.

The arbitrary power exercised by the Railroad Administration to route freight from the canals to the railroads has paralyzed the canals during the past season and will continue to do so in coming seasons if such exercise of power be permitted to continue. Under these conditions neither private enterprise nor the State will attempt to embark in canal transportation, for the business of the canals would depend wholly upon the caprice of the Railroad Administration.

WHOLE COUNTRY AFFECTED.

Vast interests in many of the States are seriously injured by the paralysis of these canals, while in New England, on the Atlantic coast, on the Pacific coast, all the States contiguous to the Great Lakes, all the States of the central and northwest, and most of the States of the Mississippi Valley, would be greatly benefited by the maximum use of the New York canals, and the entire country would be materially advantaged.

RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION SHOULD RENOUNCE POWER TO ROUTE FREIGHT FROM THE CANALS.

The material welfare of the country demands that the United States Railroad Administration shall at once and publicly renounce all claim to power under the law to route freight from the canals to the railroads, and shall at once make it known that shippers desiring to use the canals in the coming season of navigation of 1919 may prepare to do so, and that persons desiring to enter the transportation business upon the canals may be given time to prepare therefor with the assurance that freight which shippers desire to send by the canals shall be permitted to be so carried.

CONGRESS PETITIONED TO AMEND LAW.

We respectfully but earnestly appeal to and petition the Congress to at once amend the law so that the Railroad Administration shall cease to route freight from the canals, and so that shippers may be permitted to direct their freight by canal and take advantage of the lower water rate.

NEW YORK'S GOVERNOR AND LEGISLATURE PETITIONED TO ACT.

We respectfully petition the governor and the Legislature of the State of New York to take such steps as in their wisdom may be necessary and proper to restore the canals to their former and normal freedom from restraint.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION AND PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION PETITIONED TO ACT.

We respectfully petition the Interstate Commerce Commission and the public-service commission of the second district to take such measures as are provided to be taken under the amended interstate-commerce act and the law of this State, respectively, to establish physical connections between rail and water lines and to carry into effect the purpose of such laws that a free interchange of traffic between rail and water lines shall be established, and through shipments made practicable on through bill of lading to or from points beyond the canal terminals.

Respectfully submitted.

NEW YORK, December 30, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] is recognized.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose now to enter into any extended reply to the statement of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] as to the Missouri River improvement.

The gentleman from Wisconsin said the boat line had been taken off the river from Kansas City to St. Louis. That is true, but he did not tell the House, as I think he ought to have done, that the boat line was taken off because the railroad department commandeered the boats, and all the boats but one were taken over by the Government and taken to the lower Mississippi and put to work there on Government work. But the Secretary of War, before he permitted those boats to be taken off, required an agreement to be made with the boat companies of Kansas City to the effect that the boats would be put back after the war. They made that agreement, and they are acting on it in good faith; and in order that the president of this company and the company itself may be set right before the House and before the country, I ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to print as a part of my remarks the remarks of Mr. Dickey, the president of the Kansas City Boat Co., made before the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors a few days ago. It is a concise and clear statement of the intention of the company to replace their lines whenever they can get the material and whenever the time comes for them to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing the remarks indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the statement referred to:

STATEMENT OF MR. WALTER S. DICKEY.

It is the intention of the company, when the improvement shall have proceeded (the war emergency is over and normal conditions prevail), to put that capital back into boat construction of a larger and more modern type to utilize the channel of the river. At the present time, since September, we have had no operation on the river. This season, however, because of the low water and ice, we would not be operating in any event. We usually closed about this time of the year—about the 1st of December.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you kindly state a little more fully, Mr. Dickey, the intentions of your company——

Mr. DICKEY. As I say, this matter was——

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). As to building another fleet of boats and resuming traffic.

Mr. DICKEY. Of course, I am not authorized to bind the company in any sense, but at the directors' meeting, when Mr. Sanders approached us about the purchase of these boats, this whole question was reviewed, and those present at the meeting expressed to him the hope, the expectation, and the determination that if he took the craft, as soon as river improvements had continued to such a point as to make it desirable and advantageous to proceed, and after the war, it was the intention of the company to continue to operate and to reengage in freight traffic on the river with new boats.

Mr. KENNEDY. But you have no plans at present for providing a new fleet?

Mr. DICKEY. Oh, yes; we have plans.

Mr. KENNEDY. I mean you have taken no action?

Mr. DICKEY. No; we have let no contracts or anything of that kind. We could not get steel now if we wanted it, or at least we could not get even a promise of it until the last two or three days.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I recall, the manager of the company, who was before the committee last year, stated the line had been a losing proposition; is that correct?

Mr. DICKEY. The line has been a losing proposition; there is no water to make it profitable. When the channel is in that condition on account of lack of water, lack of improvements, we could only load to about one-half of our capacity.

Mr. LEA. Was there an abundance of freight, so far as your boats could handle it?

Mr. DICKEY. We always had full loads upstream; not always downstream. But in seasons when we had no water, on account of the movement of bulky commodities and we had downstream loads, we always did our best, and had the best results.

Mr. LEA. How long would it take to rebuild those boats after the construction is determined upon?

Mr. DICKEY. So far as we are concerned, the construction design is already made. We have had in our employ for several years a naval architect studying those things and making plans, and we have the plans, blue prints, and specifications, and it would take, as Mr. Tomlinson outlined to you a few moments ago, somewhere between 7 and 10 months to get power boats built. I think the time would be lessened now, but any time in the last three or four months that is about the best you could get in the way of a promise from the builders.

Mr. LEA. How did your rates compare with rail rates between the main points?

Mr. DICKEY. For all the time we were in operation, for the eight or nine years, our rates uniformly were 20 per cent less than the rail rates, whatever it might be, and on all classes of commodities and on all quantities, car lots and less than car lots.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Kansas that the debate is exhausted on this paragraph.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman can have an opportunity on the next paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Osage and Gasconade Rivers, Mo., and Kansas River, Kans.: For maintenance, $2,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I understand that what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] said is correct, but I want to call attention to page 2225 of the Engineer's Report, where it is stated——

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order. That paragraph has been passed.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, the gentleman will surely permit me to supplement his statement. I did not move to strike out the paragraph or anything. I am simply adding to that to explain that.

Mr. BOOHER. I do not think it needs explanation.

Mr. FREAR. I think it does need explanation.

Mr. BOOHER. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. FREAR. I am talking about this paragraph right here. This is a Missouri River paragraph, and there is a boat line on the adjoining river.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman is talking about the Osage and Gasconade.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman from Missouri took nearly 10 minutes of my time when I was on the floor, and I yielded to him time after time.

Mr. BOOHER. Wait! Wait! You are going too fast. [Laughter.] I will withdraw the point of order and consent to the gentleman proceeding in a minute, if he will stop.

Mr. FREAR. I quote from page 2225:

Early in the fall the Kansas City (Mo.) Navigation Co. laid up their boats for the winter—

That was before the Government took them over—and the amount of traffic that year was 4,446 tons—

After you deduct the sand.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cumberland River, Tenn. and Ky.: For improvement above Nashville in accordance with the report submitted in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 10, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $340,000: Provided, That assurances satisfactory to the Secretary of War shall be given that local interests will provide sufficient areas of water front and suitable water terminals at all towns or landings adequate for the traffic and which shall be open to the public equally and on terms satisfactory to the Secretary of War.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit an interruption, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, 5 to be used by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and 5 by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, to be used as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I shall want five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I will make it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina modifies his request and makes it 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, this is an old, familiar subject, and I know that the gentlemen interested in it are very anxious to have it adopted. It has been up before the House a number of times, but I call attention to the fact that it is a new canalization project, reaching the amount of $4,500,000, and that we have already appropriated for that river over $7,180,767. The commerce is very small, after deducting the timber and sand. I do not mean alone timber rafted but generally carried on small depths. They say that ought not to be deducted. Possibly not. But it is a limited commerce, and the commerce on the upper river is very limited when you take out the sand and timber.

Now, the statement I made a short time ago applies to this river, as many others. What have we been investing our money for, and what return have we had from it? I have told the House just exactly what the situation was on the Black Warrior River. When you shall have spent this amount we will have spent all together $12,000,000, and will not get coal.

Now, I want to read what the Engineer's Report says, with which many Members of the House are familiar. Understand I have not moved to strike it out. It would be useless to do so, and in any event it may be as good a project as some of the projects in the bill. I read from page 4 of the report:

The amount of commerce at present is not extensive when considered in connection with an expensive slackwater improvement, and the amount that may be expected in the future is only conjectural, and it is believed that, measured by the usual standards applied in considering the question of advisability in such cases, it would hardly be sufficient to warrant a favorable recommendation.

This is signed by Col. Black, senior member of the board. He states, however, that the case is exceptional, after stating that it was doubtful if the amount would be used.

The division engineer does not think that the work is justified by the commercial benefits to the general public, but he states that the present inquiry discloses important benefits to the locality that indicate the propriety of requiring local cooperation such as is often obtained from a community where it is furnished an effective transportation line. He is of opinion that the additional work should not be undertaken except on the condition that the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, or the local communities affected, shall contribute one-half of the estimated cost of construction. Otherwise he concurs with the district officer.

That is after an investigation of the project. An expenditure of $4,500,000 would mean a contribution by the people who are to be directly benefited there of $2,250,000. Now I read the next paragraph—

In addition to the information contained in the reports of the district officer and in those heretofore submitted, the board has given consideration to statements and arguments made at a hearing given at its office on January 28, 1914—

Which was attended by two United States Senators and eight Representatives, who gave expert testimony; and after that the engineers changed their report, modified it, and leaving all in regard to the uncertainty of the project they struck out all recommendations for a contribution.

Now I desire to say this, Mr. Chairman: I hope that this effort is not entirely lost in bringing these matters before the attention of the House. I have read to you from the reports. I am not drawing my conclusions. I have discussed the other projects, and I have tried to do this fairly as I viewed it. I have discussed about one-half of the projects that I might have discussed on which I had memoranda. But I feel that I have discussed enough to show the general tendency of the bill, with 70 new projects placed there by the chairman of the committee. He brought the 70 new projects to the committee. I believe investigation will disclose that practically all of the dredging by private companies is controlled by them under a gentleman's agreement and that they divide up the work and in effect determine territory. The Government is hamstrung and choked and gagged as a result. Still some gentlemen say, "Let us do this for the purpose of keeping the soldiers employed when they come back." If we want to build highways or anything else, to get any substantial returns, very well; but, for heaven's sake, what result is had in throwing all this money into all these rivers, in addition to what we have put there before?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take any unnecessary time. I know what the answer to my arguments will be, and I accept it as such, but I have just read the engineers' report on this project under discussion, in which they state, in effect, that they doubted the advisability of the project and at a time when we are going to raise money by the sale of liberty bonds and by heavy taxation.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin does serious injustice to himself as well as to the Cumberland River section by the manner in which he has undertaken to criticize it. I never have any disposition to engage in personalities, and have none now. I do wish, however, to protest against the manner in which the gentleman has undertaken to discredit this project. Any gentleman has the most perfect right to take up the facts of a legislative proposition and discuss them and state his conclusions; but the gentleman has persistently, for a day or two, gone out of his way to refer to this river without stating a single fact in support of the derogatory remarks which he has made.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that this river is more than 500 miles in its navigable length. Three hundred and twenty-five miles of the lower end of this river have been locked and dammed by the Government. Twenty-five miles of the upper end have been locked and dammed by the Government. We have now a middle section, comprising 171 miles in length, through a territory from 50 to 120 miles wide, which has no railroad or other transportation, which has no outlet for the commerce of that section except by this river.

The main purpose in adopting the original project, which was done in 1886, and stood here favorably acted on for 20 years, both by Congress and the Engineer Department—the primary purpose in locking and damming the lower river—was to reach the great timber, coal, and other resources of that bottled-up section, which was and is now without transportation facilities.

It is apparent that a railroad completed at both ends, incomplete in the middle, where the main resources which it is to carry are found, will not have a great volume of commerce until it is completed. This is the condition of this river project. My friend did not read the finishing and favorable statement of the Department of Engineers. They said this project should be completed, because it had been largely built, but was incomplete, because this immense stretch of country, larger than Connecticut, was bottled up and comprised the chief resources, which it would afford an outlet for, and because this was the original purpose of the project. The gentleman would indicate that there was only a few tons of commerce on it. I ran down in 1914, while conditions were normal, the details of the commerce. I found that it was valued at about $8,000,000 on the upper river—314,000 tons. Deduct the sand which my friend from Wisconsin seems to complain about, and there were 213,000 tons, valued at nearly $8,000,000. This amount chiefly dribbled out of the bottled-up section of this river during the rainy season of the winter and spring.

There are enough losses on account of high water which suddenly comes and washes away freight which is waiting on the river banks for steamboats to pay for the construction of a lock every year in this undeveloped section of the river.

If a waterway more than 500 miles long, which runs 200 miles through the undeveloped timber, coal, and agricultural regions of Kentucky and more than 300 miles through the blue-grass Cumberland basin of Tennessee—if that waterway is not to be utilized I would be inclined to agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin that we should abandon waterway commerce in every respect and depend entirely on the railroads, although they have practically broken themselves down by lowering their rates at waterway points in order to drive off waterway commerce and by having engaged in other acts of that kind. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is honest in his convictions. I have no desire to criticize him in any respect. He is just mistaken about the facts in this case. If he were fully cognizant of all the facts, notwithstanding his inherent opposition to all waterway construction, I believe he would support this particular proposition.

The facts are that way back yonder in 1888 the Congress of the United States determined upon the canalization of the Cumberland River from its mouth to the head of navigation. The plan was to construct 28 locks and dams. The matter progressed. Construction went on until now the river is canalized completely below Nashville, Tenn., at an expenditure on the part of the Government of more than $3,000,000, and above Nashville, Tenn., about $3,000,000 has been expended. Seven locks and dams have been constructed on the Tennessee side above Nashville, Tenn., and one on the Kentucky side below Burnside, Ky. More than 500 miles of the entire length of the river has already been locked and dammed except the stretch of territory of 171 miles. As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] just said, one of the primary objects Congress had in view when it undertook to canalize the river was to reach the valuable coal and timber lands in the upper Cumberland which lie in that stretch of the river of 171 miles that has not been locked and dammed.

The question is, Is the Congress of the United States, after having expended over $6,000,000, over two-thirds of the amount of money necessary for the canalization of this river—and there is only a stretch of 171 miles yet to be locked and dammed—is it going to refuse to continue to appropriate money for the canalization of this river and thereby fail to reach the valuable coal and timber lands on the upper section of the Cumberland River?

Besides this, as has been suggested here, there is a stretch of territory there as big as the entire State of Connecticut that has not a foot of railroad within its boundary lines and no means of transportation except upon the Cumberland River. You can not have transportation on the Cumberland River in that stretch of 171 miles except for four or five months out of the year.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Unless this improvement is completed.

Mr. POWERS. Of course, unless the improvement is completed. If the coal veins along that stream were 25 feet thick, if the mountains were absolutely full of it, there is not a coal company in the world that could afford to put up a coal-mining plant on the banks of that stream under present conditions and only get transportation four or five months out of the year. It is complained here that the commerce is not sufficient to justify the expenditure of this money. Why, if the railroad companies, if the coal-mining companies, if the manufacturing interests of the country should take the position that commerce does not justify at present the construction of a railroad to a big mountain full of coal there would never be any railroads constructed and never be any coal produced.

There is no way to have transportation unless you have something to transport, and you can not transport the coal in these mountains, nor the timber on these hills, unless this river is completely locked and dammed. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Ohio River: Continuing improvement and for maintenance by open-channel work, $300,000.

Mr. ROBBINS rose.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall close in eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I was before an inland waterway convention last Tuesday at Pittsburgh, and I was requested to offer an amendment to this paragraph increasing the amount $5,000,000 for the purpose of completing the improvement of the Ohio River. I do not intend to offer that amendment, because investigation of the condition of this improvement has convinced me—and the members of the Rivers and Harbors Committee so advise me—that although it is progressing very slowly, much more slowly than it ought to progress, there is money enough now available to carry the canalization of the Ohio River through probably to completion. At least, there is all the money now appropriated that can be expended until the next river and harbor bill is brought before the House. The balance yet unexpended from previous appropriations is $9,711,952.25 for construction of locks and dams and $372,359 for channel work. This improvement contemplates the erection of 38 dams to improve the river by slack-water navigation to Cincinnati. Twenty-three of those locks and dams have been completed. Six of them have not been begun, and nine of them are in various stages of construction. So that the slack-water navigation on the Ohio River, which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] criticises as being unproductive of freight traffic, is in a condition where it can not transport freight traffic, because it is incomplete, and the greater part of the year, by reason of these gaps caused by the 15 dams that have not been completed, the stage of water will not afford regular and systematic navigation. But what has been the result on the Ohio River even with this handicap, with 15 sections of the river not improved. In 1917, the last available year for which a Government report is given, 1,664,000 tons of coal were floated down that river, although navigable conditions existed but a very small portion of the time. The total tonnage on the river that year was 1,925,000, which included over 60 different articles of commerce, showing that the commerce on the Ohio River after it is completely canalized from Pittsburgh to the south will develop into a mighty traffic and furnish cheap transportation to the coal and other northern products that naturally seek markets in the South.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. ROBBINS. I am coming to what the gentleman so ably discussed a few moments ago, and I trust he will bear with me until I conclude my statement. I have been more than amazed at this continued claiming in the debate on this bill that water transportation is on the decline. That can not be so; but the reason that it has received a setback within the last two or three years is because of the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the railroad legislation of the country. Especially is this true since the Government has taken control of the railroads and also assumed control of the canals and navigable rivers. The Interstate Commerce Commission had no jurisdiction over water transportation until 1912, and before that time the railroads were endeavoring to get into their haul a link of water transportation, and then the whole haul was taken out from under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and by that means river transportation was stifled because the railroads would not make joint rates with the water transportation of the country. Take the single illustration of the transportation between Arkansas City and Cairo, because that is a point where water transportation existed until recently, when the boats were driven off by unfair competition. There was a rate made by the river boats between those points which was met by the railroad rate, but intermediate points, such as McGehee, Ark., which was on the direct line of the rail haul between Arkansas City and Cairo, was given a much higher rate by rail to Cairo than the water rate to make up for the loss to the railroad, and the same thing happened in the transportation between Pittsburgh and Cincinnati. For over 50 years there existed on that stream what was known as the Pittsburgh & Cincinnati Packet Co., running a line of river packets between those two ports, carrying passengers and freight, but when the Interstate Commerce Commission refused to compel the railroads to make a joint rate so that the freight that was carried from Pittsburgh to Cincinnati could be sent out over the railroads to given points not on the river and the freight carried from Cincinnati north to Pittsburgh could be distributed to other points reached only by rail, the railroads put in force a through rate between Cincinnati and Pittsburgh that the boats could not meet and would not pro rate with the water transportation for destinations beyond the limit of the water transportation, and all of that traffic disappeared. The result was that the Pittsburgh & Cincinnati Packet Co. was compelled to stop operation in a single day. No more conspicuous example of the unfair methods adopted by the railroads can be cited than the effect on the coal traffic at Cincinnati and on the coal traffic from Pittsburgh and upriver points to Cincinnati and the southern ports along the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers by the refusal to make joint rates than this.

The Interstate Commerce Commission refused to enforce this Panama Canal act of April, 1912, and the railroads refused to make joint rates as the result.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the time——

Mr. SMALL. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding, but the time fixed must be extended.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I include that in my request. It is very interesting and I think the House would like to hear the gentleman.

Mr. ROBBINS. I will only take two minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman ask unanimous consent that the time may be extended two minutes and let the gentleman from Pennsylvania occupy that time?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman only wants two minutes, but I would like to make it five. I will ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the time be extended for five minutes, the additional five minutes to be used by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the effect, as I was stating, of the ruling of the Interstate Commerce Commission on section 11 of the Panama Canal act of 1912 was to cause railroads to refuse to establish joint rates with water carriers between Pittsburgh and the South on coal.

After the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad was built to the coal fields of West Virginia from Cincinnati a condition happened that illustrates exactly the effect of this failure to make joint rates between rail and river traffic.

The Chesapeake & Ohio made a through rate into Cincinnati on coal which it refused to prorate with the river boats, and then refused to make a joint rate for river coal at Cincinnati destined for distribution into the smaller cities and towns around Cincinnati, and the result has been that 19 coal docks at Cincinnati, according to the very latest report, had to go out of business, and all that country in southern Illinois, Tennessee, and Ohio that was formerly getting coal by river had to obtain their supply by transfer on railroads and have it hauled out to points where river transportation did not reach, and they had to pay the additional freight as part of the increased price. Now, gentlemen, I know it is useless to make these statements in discussing a river and harbor bill unless one can suggest some remedy for it. The remedy, however, is very clear to those who have studied the situation. What Congress must do is to amend the interstate-commerce act making mandatory the provision contained in section 11 of the Panama Canal act which was construed by the commission as discretionary only. If we do that and compel the river and rail systems of transportation to make joint rates, the whole southern country would be given the advantage of cheap coal from the North, and the North would, by reason of cheap freight rates, obtain cotton and farm produce from the South, and we would again bring back our commerce to the rivers which has been driven off by this system of the railroads failing to prorate with water-borne craft.

When a steamboat line on a river is doing a reasonably fair and profitable business, under present conditions it would be bought up by a competing railroad, or they would install a river fleet alongside of it, and by making cheap rates drive it out of business and make up the loss by charging higher rates where water competition does not exist.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will yield, will the gentleman just state briefly what his remedy is? Some of us are not familiar with the exact terms of the interstate-commerce act.

Mr. ROBBINS. The interstate-commerce act originally did not include water transportation at all, but in the Panama Canal bill, which was passed in 1912, section 11 extended the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over river traffic.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; now, what does the gentleman desire to do?

Mr. ROBBINS. Just wait. When the Interstate Commerce Commission was brought face to face with the question of the construction of that act by a suit brought by the St. Louis & New Orleans Steamboat Co., operating between St. Louis and New Orleans, in which it filed a rate and demanded the right to join with the competing railroads in making joint rates, the Interstate Commerce Commission construed this provision of the act not as mandatory, but held it to be discretionary with the railroad and refused to enforce it. Now, Congress wants to enact legislation to compel joint rates which will, I believe, restore this river traffic, and this can be done by amending the interstate-commerce act and make its terms obligatory and require joint rates between river and rail traffic.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. And issue through bills of lading?

Mr. ROBBINS. So through bills of lading can be issued from the point of shipment, whether it be for traffic originating by water or by rail and whether the point of destination be on a water route or railroad.

There is another matter that has resulted in discrimination here. Up until this time bankers will not accept bills of lading over water-transportation routes as security for loans; they will, however, accept bills of lading from rail-transportation lines. The result of this unfair discrimination has been that the shippers by water have been compelled to carry their own paper with their own financial resources, whereas a rail shipper, in competition, could take his paper to the bank and on a bill of lading obtain cash or credit; and that is no small matter in a business like the coal business, where long-distance shipments are made, with long-time paper taken in payment, and long-term credit must be extended.

Now, gentlemen, I think this is a very important matter, when we come to study the difficulties under which water-borne commerce on the rivers of the United States is operated. My friend from Wisconsin, Mr. FREAR, is constantly criticizing the declining freight and traffic movement on water. Why, the greatest freight movement in western Pennsylvania is to get up to the Lakes with our coal during the summer season, in order that we may send it to the Northwest by cheap water transportation. And from the 15th of March until the 15th of November every possible effort is made down at the mines to mine coal and ship all the coal possible to the Lakes. Why? Because of the cheap transportation we get by water up to Duluth, Superior, Milwaukee, Racine, Detroit, Chicago, and lake ports. When the lake freezes up we can not ship that coal, by reason of the difference in the cost of the freight by rail and water on the traffic. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the interesting part of the discussion is that I am always brought into the controversy when I have no opportunity to answer. I have never suggested anything about what the gentleman was referring to, and he replies to what the "gentleman from Wisconsin" says about Lake Erie. I would like to discuss it, as I have in the past, but I have not time.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a portion of pages 2247 and 2250 of the Engineer's Report, which shows the amount of traffic carried on the Cumberland River in recent years.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] has made a very distinct contribution to this debate. He has entered into a phase of traffic upon our interior waterways which must be studied and discussed. No intelligent man denies the lack of traffic upon many of our interior rivers, but that constitutes no reason for their abandonment. As intelligent men it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to find the remedy and apply it. There are reasons, and good reasons, why traffic does not exist and why it has declined. In part those reasons are due to the indifference of localities in not providing boat lines, in not constructing terminals, in not providing for interchange of traffic between the water carriers and the railroads. Then we must have more legislation, not only along the line suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, enforcing interchange of traffic, compelling the fair treatment on the part of the railroads, but perhaps even going so far as to regulate water rates; and whenever an enlightened public sentiment and the Congress shall undertake the solution of this problem along these intelligent, progressive, and aggressive lines, and give water transportation a fair and equal chance, unmolested, so that those who desire to send traffic by water may do so upon equal terms, with every facility which the railroads possess, then you will have a restoration of water traffic. And the Ohio River will be one of the most conspicuous rivers in the country in the volume and value of traffic carried. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Grand Marais, Marquette, Marquette Bay, and Ontonagon Harbors, and Keweenaw Waterway, Mich.; Ashland and Port Wing Harbors, Wis.; Duluth-Superior Harbor, Minn. and Wis.; Agate Bay and Grand Marais Harbors, Minn.: For maintenance, $59,000; completing improvement of Duluth-Superior Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1018, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, $24,000; completing improvement of Keweenaw Waterway at Princess Point in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 835, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $138,000; in all, $221,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, we are now nearing the completion of the river and harbor bill, and I certainly do not want to take up unduly any of the time in the House. The bill has had a rocky road. Many of its provisions have been violently attacked, small as well as great. In fact, this morning we debated for an hour, I believe, a provision involving only $1,000.

I have in mind a river improvement now in progress in the sunny Southland, in comparison with which any item of this bill is utterly insignificant. It is purely a river improvement. It ought to be carried in this bill if anywhere, and yet the reason why it is not carried in this bill is obvious. It is because the Rivers and Harbors Committee and the Congress would never have approved it. They never have approved it so far. It is part of a plan that has been repeatedly turned down by Congress. And yet it is now going on, is in process of construction, because a way has been found to find the appropriation outside of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read some correspondence that I have had recently with the War Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the correspondence.

NOVEMBER 14, 1918.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have just read a clipping from the Nashville Tennesseean of last Monday, stating that work on the Muscle Shoals Dam has been ordered to be resumed. I should be glad to be advised as to whether this statement is true, and if so, first, how much is it estimated that the entire cost of the dam will be; second, does the estimated cost of the dam include power plant, and if not what is its estimated cost; third, if the total cost of the project shall exceed the amount heretofore appropriated out of the so-called nitrate fund, is it contemplated to draw on some other fund or to ask Congress for an additional appropriation; fourth, how long is it estimated that it will take to complete the project; fifth, is it expected that the power to be furnished by the project will be continuous throughout the year, or is it expected that at certain seasons there will be either no power developed or less than at other seasons; sixth, is it expected that all power so developed shall be used in connection with the nitrate plant recently erected at Muscle Shoals, or is it expected that a portion of it will be used by other plants, and if so, what plants?

Your compliance with the request for the information above indicated will greatly oblige,

Yours, very sincerely, NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 21, 1918.

Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LONGWORTH: Acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 14th ultimo requesting certain information regarding the dam at Muscle Shoals, Tennessee River, I have the honor to state that on November 9 information was received from the chairman of the War Industries Board that restrictions could now be withdrawn from this construction, and the district engineer was at once notified to resume work on the project.

Referring to the specific questions propounded in your letter, the following information is submitted:

1. The total cost of the project was estimated in October, 1917, to be $14,534,000, based upon then prevailing wages and prices of material. On February 23, 1918, because of the lowering of the cost of cement to the Government, the estimate was reduced to $14,000,000.

2. This estimate includes the dam, locks, and flowage rights, and the power house with hydroelectric machinery capable of generating about 120,000 horsepower. The power-house substructure will be constructed so as to provide for placing additional units in the future, if desired, in order to utilize the noncontinuous or secondary power in connection with steam-generating units already installed at nitrate plant No. 2.

3. If the amount available from the appropriation of section 124 of the national-defense act should prove insufficient to complete the project, it will be supplemented by reimbursing the appropriation for expenditures already made from that fund which might, with equal propriety, have been made from other funds at the disposal of the bureau. Such reimbursement will be deferred until the necessity therefor actually arises.

4. It is estimated that about three years will be required for the completion of the project.

5. Of the power to be furnished by the project, it is estimated that approximately 72,000 horsepower will be continuous throughout the year. In all but the driest years it is to be expected that approximately 100,000 horsepower can be developed continuously.

6. The most economical development of power at Dam No. 2 requires the ultimate installation of generating capacity largely in excess of the requirements of Nitrate Plants Nos. 1 and 2, in order that advantage may be taken of the large amount of secondary power available at the dam. It is probable, however, that the initial installation will not be greater than required for the operation of the nitrate plants and that no surplus power will be available for use by other plants.

Very truly, yours,

BENEDICT CROWELL,
The Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is obvious that I could not undertake to discuss this question in this brief time, and I am only calling your attention to some features of it as a preliminary. I intend to discuss this subject at length and in detail at the earliest possible moment.

If you caught the reading of the dates of those two letters, you will note that it took the department five weeks to answer those six simple questions. I have propounded, in addition to those, some 50 other questions in the endeavor to bring out, if possible, this whole nitrate situation, on which up to date has been spent, as nearly as I can figure, considerably more than $100,000,000, all of which is waste, for not one ounce of nitrates has yet been produced, and not one ounce of nitrates for war purposes or for governmental purposes will ever be produced.

This is one of the connecting links. It is one of the three dams known as the Muscle Shoals project—a project turned down time after time by Congress. This $14,000,000 was not taken from any fund designed for the purpose of any sort of water improvement. It was all that was left of the nitrate $20,000,000 appropriation, an appropriation for the purpose of building nitrate plants, and nitrate plants only.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who directed that expenditure?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The President of the United States.

The history briefly is this: When the nitrate plant known as plant No. 2 was about to be constructed at Muscle Shoals another fund, never designed for the purpose of building nitrate plants, was tapped. It was a provision carried in the national-defense act providing an appropriation for ammunition for field, mountain, and siege cannon of some $300,000,000. Out of this, as an original expenditure, $45,000,000 was taken to build a plant at Muscle Shoals. I propose to show at a later date that it was a unanimous recommendation of the commission, formed for the purpose by the Secretary of War—a unanimous recommendation that Muscle Shoals should not be chosen as a site. But it was chosen. How and why, I hope may later be made clear.

There is not an ounce of water power there, and this proposition is to create, at the expense of the people of the United States, water power not now in existence at Muscle Shoals. For what purpose? For the purpose of supplying the power for this plant. And for what purpose will this plant be operated? No nitrates are needed for ammunition. All that this plant can ever be used for is the production of fertilizer; and all that is being done, gentlemen, is to spend $14,000,000—and it will cost more than that—to furnish water power for a private corporation to produce fertilizer in this plant at Muscle Shoals, which has cost the Government to date, as I am informed, over $60,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask permission, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for five minutes, and then I will not ask for any more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Why, gentlemen, this bill carries $26,000,000, less than twice the cost of this one dam. It has been described as a "pork-barrel bill." The Ohio River project, part provision for which has been just passed, does not all together involve the expenditure of more than $60,000,000, and that for the benefit of millions of people in the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys. Do you call that "pork" when we have already expended and are in process of expending more by a third than that at one place on the Tennessee River—to benefit whom? One private corporation.

You will recall that I vigorously opposed this proposition of diverting $14,000,000 from our nitrate fund to build the dam at Muscle Shoals, and I took the ground that it was not a war expenditure, and gentlemen on the floor defended it as a war expenditure pure and simple, although it was stated at that time, and it is now repeated by the Chief of Engineers, that the completion of this dam would take somewhere about four years. Shortly after the war started my view was apparently upheld by the Secretary of War, who ordered work on the dam discontinued on the ground that it was not an essential. Now, it crops up again to plague us. There was not a single man here who believed that the war was going to last four years. Certainly the war is over now and we are spending, as I say, far more than the cost of the Ohio River improvement on this one proposition, and that for the benefit of one private corporation.

Mr. MADDEN. Is that private corporation manufacturing hydroelectric energy?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; they manufacture nitrates for fertilizing purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. Who composes the corporation?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The Air Nitrates Corporation, a corporation with $1,000 capital, divided into 10 shares, controlled by the president and directors of the American Cyanamid Co., which was formed to relieve the American Cyanamid Co. from any liability on the construction of this plant. They have received $1,000,000 in cash for supervision. They have not put up a single cent; they have assumed no liabilities; and now the Government is expending $14,000,000 to produce power to make fertilizer for this company.

Mr. MADDEN. In addition to the million dollars they are to receive a profit to be derived from the investment of this $100,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Their royalties will amount to somewhere about $2,000,000 a year, and they assume no liability or risk whatever. Now, forsooth, we are going to build for them—the American people are going to build for them—a dam to operate their plant for their own profit. It is stated in the body of the letter just read that the power to be generated at this dam will only be sufficient to supply this one plant. Did you ever hear of a monopoly more complete?

Mr. MADDEN. They must be influential in some quarters of the Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not care to say now what my private opinion is of this entire transaction. I do not want to make any statement which can not be backed by the authority of the Secretary of War, and I will wait for an answer to my letter before saying more. I have not much hope of a speedy answer, because if it took 5 weeks to answer 6 simple questions Congress may be adjourned before I receive an answer to 50.

Mr. MADDEN. Why does not the gentleman make his request for answers in relays of five?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I hope to be able before long in one discourse to lay before the House fully and frankly and without mincing words the result of my investigation into this whole nitrate proposition. Therefore I do not care now to make any specific answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois. I will postpone it until I receive full information. I will say that if the information is not forthcoming, specific and accurate, I intend to move that an investigation be had by Congress of this entire nitrate proposition, including the two abandoned Ohio plants as well as this Muscle Shoals monstrosity, its aiders and abettors, and particularly of the activities of the Air Nitrates Corporation. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Manistique Harbor, Mich; Menominee, Oconto, Green Bay, Algoma, Kewaunee, Two Rivers, Manitowoc, Sheboygan, Port Washington, Milwaukee, Racine, Kenosha, and Waukegan Harbors, Sturgeon Bay & Lake Michigan Ship Canal, and Fox River, Wis.: For maintenance, $38,000; completing improvement of Sturgeon Bay & Lake Michigan Ship Canal in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1382, Sixty-second Congress, third session, $33,000; in all, $71,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors a question. I notice that the harbors of Racine and Kenosha, in my district, mentioned in that paragraph, are included with a half dozen or dozen more under one item for maintenance—$38,000. In the city of Racine there is going on a harbor improvement of great importance—the completion of the south half of the Arrowhead project. This bill contains no appropriation for the completion of that project. I want to know if my information is correct—that there is money enough now on hand to keep the contractor busy during the next year.

Mr. SMALL. I will say as to the particular work and improvement to which the gentleman refers, that there are contracts outstanding involving $146,000, and in addition to that they have about $23,000 in cash on hand and available. I will read from page 1439 of the Engineer's Report:

The funds now available are sufficient for completion of harbor entrance and continuing extension of south breakwater, and for maintenance of harbor to June 30, 1920; therefore no estimate is submitted.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So that the work on the existing contract can proceed during the coming season?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; and the existing work maintained.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is a much-needed improvement and one which the city has been looking to for a long time. Now, on page 28, beginning on line 6 of the bill, is this language:

Provided, That no preliminary examination, survey, project, or estimate for new works other than those designated in this or some prior act or joint resolution shall be made.

In the last river and harbor bill there was a provision for making a survey at Kenosha. I do not know whether the survey has ever been made, but there is in this bill no specific provision for the survey at that harbor. But that survey, if not made under the other bill, could be made under that proviso, could it not?

Mr. SMALL. Yes. The law authorizing it will remain in force until it has actually been submitted to Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of obtaining information. The item before the committee provides for $38,000 for maintenance of some 8 or 10 very important harbors on the Great Lakes, among them that of my own city, Milwaukee. Some years ago I called attention to the fact that none of this money was used for maintenance of the inner harbor at Milwaukee, which carries a tonnage of more than 6,000,000 annually. I can not reconcile $38,000 as adequate in a minor degree for maintenance purposes of harbors such as Milwaukee, Racine, Waukegan, Manistique, Oconto, Green Bay, Two Rivers, Manitowoc, Sheboygan, whose aggregate tonnage is several millions.

Mr. MADDEN. There are 8,000,000 tons at Milwaukee alone.

Mr. STAFFORD. In my home city there are 8,000,000 tons, I am reminded; and I wish to ask in all fairness why the committee discriminates against the Lakes in the appropriations for maintenance, and yet in some projects you provide thousands of dollars even for the removal of snags and floating hyacinths. In all fairness, why does the committee have one policy for the Atlantic seaboard and the Pacific seaboard and the Gulf ports and another for the Great Lakes? I ask the question in all sincerity, because I think it is an unfair discrimination.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, at Milwaukee both the inner and the outer harbors are recognized as being under improvement. For the inner harbor there was on hand $24,366.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. SMALL. Let me answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is not directing his reply to the point that I make. I am quite well aware of the condition of the appropriations for the inner harbor and the outer harbor. My inquiry is why you discriminate in the way of maintenance, dredging, and the like against the Great Lakes—why you have one policy for the southern river projects and another for the projects on the Great Lakes?

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that from the very day that I entered Congress there has been one policy so far as the maintenance of inner harbors on the Great Lakes is concerned, and a different policy for the maintenance of harbors or streams entering the ocean or the Gulf. I called the attention of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors during my first term 16 years ago to that, and I called the attention of the committee to it some 3 or 4 years ago, and had incorporated in the then bill an item providing that the maintenance fund could be utilized for inner-harbor improvements. The gentleman, as chairman of the committee, does himself ill justice, notwithstanding his erudition respecting projects pertaining to the Atlantic seaboard, to say that there are not different policies as to maintenance of rivers on the Great Lakes from those in other parts of the country. He can not show me where there has been $1,000 expended for dredging on the inner harbor of Milwaukee, and I challenge him to show that; and that was the purpose of my rising, in all good faith, to ask why as to some harbors they provide for maintenance in the inner harbors of the Great Lakes, whereas on others they do not, and he has not answered the question.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman did not make himself clear at first, and I think I know now to what the gentleman refers. In House Document No. 1067, Sixty-first Congress, third session, submitted to Congress December 5, 1910, the Secretary of War submitted a report. By leave of the House I append to my remarks copy of the report of the Chief of Engineers, also the report of the special board, followed by the report of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. This report will furnish valuable information.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield? Was the city so famous for the amber-colored beverage asking anything more for this harbor or claiming that it ought to have anything more expended there?

Mr. SMALL. I do not understand the gentleman from Wisconsin to be asking for more. I did not at first understand the purport of his inquiry. I now do understand it, because that particular report comes to my mind, and it is an interesting report, and I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting portions of it, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 25, 1910.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith, for transmission to Congress, report dated December 18, 1909, by the board of Engineer officers constituted by Special Orders, No. 20, office of the Chief of Engineers, April 30, 1909, in accordance with the following item in the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1909:

"The Secretary of War is authorized to appoint a board of engineers to examine those harbors on the Great Lakes and elsewhere in which the whole or a part of the harbor is improved at local expense, which board shall make recommendations with a view to determining whether the improvements so made by local authorities should be undertaken or maintained by the General Government and to establishing uniform rules in making harbor improvements."

After discussing the subject at length, the special board concludes with the following recommendations covering the several questions involved:

"1. That the advisability or inadvisability of the Government's undertaking any work at any harbor be determined in the manner now established by existing law and practice.

"2. That no work of construction or maintenance be undertaken by the Government at any harbor constructed by and operated in the interest of a corporation or private person and adapted to the promotion of such interest only.

"3. That the work of the Government at any harbor be confined to the general part of the harbor, including, as may be necessary, the construction and maintenance of breakwaters, with the general anchorage area protected thereby, of entrance piers and jetties at the mouths of inner channels, and the portion of such channels immediately between them, and also of such long general channels of approach as may be necessary to connect the harbor with outside deep water.

"With regard to the first provision of the law, regarding those harbors in which the whole or part of the harbor is improved at local expense, the board recommends that the improvements so made by local authorities should not be undertaken or maintained by the General Government."

This report has been reviewed by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors in accordance with the law, and it concurs in the principles and recommendations contained in items 1 and 2 as quoted above. It concurs also in the general principles enunciated in item 3 and in the final paragraph relating to harbors in which the whole or part of the harbor is improved at local expense. It recognizes, however, that there may be instances in which the interests of the general public will not require a rigid application of the principles stated in item 3, and that there may be exceptional cases in which improvements made by local interests will fall within the class of works deemed proper for the General Government to undertake or maintain, or that will so conform to an advantageous project for further improvement of the locality as to merit special consideration.

I concur in the views of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors.

Very respectfully,

W. H. BIXBY,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

REPORT OF EXAMINATION OF HARBORS ON THE GREAT LAKES AND ELSEWHERE.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, December 18, 1909.

SIR: The board of Engineer officers constituted by Special Orders, No. 20, Office of the Chief of Engineers, "to examine those harbors on the Great Lakes and elsewhere in which the whole or a part of the harbor is improved at local expense," has the honor to submit the following report:

The order convening the board is as follows:

"WAR DEPARTMENT,

"SPECIAL ORDERS, "OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
"No. 20. "Washington, April 30, 1909.

"By authority of the Secretary of War, a board of officers of the Corps of Engineers, to consist of Col. Daniel W. Lockwood, Col. Dan C. Kingman, Lieut. Col. Curtis McD. Townsend, Lieut. Col. John Millis, Maj. Charles S. Riché, will assemble at Cleveland, Ohio, upon the call of the senior member, not later than May 15, 1909, 'to examine those harbors on the Great Lakes and elsewhere in which the whole or a part of the harbor is improved at local expense,' and report, as provided in the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1909.

"The board is authorized to visit such points as it deems necessary for the proper performance of its duties.

"Upon the completion of the duties assigned them the members of the board will return to their proper stations.

"The travel directed is necessary in the military service.

"By command of the Chief of Engineers:

"FREDERIC V. ABBOT,
"Lieut. Col., Corps of Engineers."

By letter of April 24, 1909, addressed to all officers in charge of river and harbor districts in the United States and in the insular possessions, the Chief of Engineers called for reports covering any improvements of the character mentioned in the law within their respective districts, these reports to give the details of each work as regards nature and scope of project, estimated cost, status as to completion, expenditures by the Federal Government and by other interests, respectively, and the character of the other interests. Each officer was also directed to submit such views and recommendations as the work in his district of the kind referred to might suggest, or as he might consider pertinent to the subject and of value to the board. All of the reports received in compliance with the above instructions were referred to the board, and they have been classified and a synopsis of the facts stated by the district officers has been prepared in a shape for convenient comparison and consideration. This synopsis is appended hereto. Many of these reports go into matters pertaining to the relations between Government work and that done at private or local expense on rivers, dredged channels, and other waterways. While these works involve many important questions in connection with the general subject of harbor and waterway improvement, the wording of the law below quoted confines the duties of the board specifically to harbors, and the discussion in this report is limited accordingly.

Under the original orders and subsequent detailed orders and instructions from the Chief of Engineers the board, either as a whole or by committee, has visited and examined the harbors at Duluth, Minn.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Chicago, Ill.; Toledo, Ohio; Lorain, Ohio; Cleveland, Ohio; Ashtabula, Ohio; Conneaut, Ohio; Buffalo, N. Y.; Boston, Mass.; Philadelphia, Pa.; and Baltimore, Md.

The duties of the board are defined in the act of Congress approved March 3, 1909, which provides as follows:

"The Secretary of War is authorized to appoint a board of engineers to examine those harbors on the Great Lakes and elsewhere in which the whole or a part of the harbor is improved at local expense, which board shall make recommendations with a view to determining whether the improvements so made by local authorities should be undertaken or maintained by the General Government and to establishing uniform rules in making harbor improvements."

The board is thus called upon to make recommendations in regard to two things: First, whether or not harbor improvements made at local expense should be undertaken or maintained by the General Government; and, second, as to uniform rules in making harbor improvements.

The first proposition is a special one. The second is general in character, and since in the solution of problems it is always best to make the general solution first and then pass to the special case, the board will take up first in order the second proposition given in the law.

It will be well at the outset to consider harbors in general, in order to ascertain what they are, how they are used, and what they should supply to meet the demands of water-borne commerce. The name "harbor" was originally applied to a shelter for soldiers, hence afterwards to a lodging place or inn, and finally to a portion of a sea or lake or other large body of water, either landlocked or artificially protected so as to be a place of safety for vessels in stormy weather. Such shelters are always desirable in exposed localities along the natural routes of ships, and they are so important that, if not supplied by nature, countries frequently provide them at heavy expense. They ought to furnish a sheltered area of sufficient size for all the vessels likely to take refuge in them. The depth of water should be sufficient to safely float the largest ship and not too great for convenient anchorage. The bottom should be of a character to afford a good holding ground. The shelter against the waves should be complete, and it is desirable also that shelter against the prevailing winds should be afforded. The entrances and exits should be convenient, adequate, and safe at all times.

In law and commercial usage a harbor has come to mean something more than this. It is not only a place of shelter, but it is also a place where vessels are admitted to discharge and receive their cargoes, from whence they depart, and where they finish their voyages. Such harbors, for convenience of loading and unloading vessels, should be equipped with wharves extending into water of sufficient depth to permit the ship to lie alongside; and if the rise and fall of the tide is excessive, it is sometimes necessary to completely inclose large basins in which the water is maintained at a constant level and into which vessels are received and discharged by means of locks.

In harbors of extensive commerce the articles shipped are not produced in the immediate vicinity, nor are the articles received from the vessels consumed locally. The shipments are drawn from a wide extent of country and the receipts are sent back to the same places. Such a harbor becomes to a large extent a place where the mode of transportation is changed from land to water and from water to land. This introduces another set of conditions into the problem; that is to say, the land routes and land approaches.

The land routes may be by streets and roads, and sometimes by rivers and canals, but in our own time and country they consist principally of railroads. Therefore every consideration of economy and facility of transporting freights require that the train should be brought alongside of the ship. It is just as necessary in an important harbor that it should afford abundant rail routes to the territory to be served and convenient access for the trains to the wharves as it is that it should possess corresponding facilities for the vessels. A harbor without proper railway facilities is no better than a harbor without any water in it.

To summarize, then: A good harbor must possess a sheltered water area of adequate dimensions, with one or more convenient channels of approach to the same; it must afford a sufficient anchorage for vessels waiting to be berthed or something to take the place of it; it must have wharves, warehouses, and wharf machinery suited to all the varied commerce that comes to the port; it must have good roads and streets by which these wharves can be reached; and, above all, it must have good and sufficient railroads penetrating all the region to be served, with good yard room and trackage to place the trains alongside the warehouses or the ships. Since most of these things must be supplied artificially, it is evident that the best result would be attained if the whole were under a single direction and control; and the best harbors in the world are to be found among those where this has been possible. In the United States it is not possible. The United States controls its navigable waters, and sometimes it improves them when desirable or necessary. It has the right to build and operate railroads, but it has never done so. This has been left to companies chartered by the States, and it is in accordance with the custom of our people and the spirit of our Government that such things as wharves and warehouses should be provided by individual or corporation effort and roads and streets by the local governments.

How, then, ought a harbor to be secured, improved, or maintained in this country? And what should be the dividing line or lines in the matters of design, control, and cost? Before attempting to answer this it is well to consider the different classes of the commerce of a harbor in reference to its general and local value.

First we have those commodities drawn from a wide extent of country, brought by land routes to the port and sent across the sea. And to this belongs also the return cargoes of the ships which is put upon the cars and scattered over the country for consumption. This class of commerce in our country is of very great value, and has much to do with the general welfare, for it comprises the surplus products of the farms, the forests, and the mines. But it is not of very great local value to the harbor through which it passes, for every consideration of economy and efficiency demands that the transfer between car and ship shall be effected with the least possible expenditure of money and labor. Hence the less money it leaves in the harbor the better it is for the commerce. The wharves and landing places for this class of commerce are frequently placed outside the city limits, so that the trains do not have to pass through the city at all, and some successful harbors of this class are found where there is no city, a small village being quite sufficient to accommodate all of the people that can gain a livelihood from the very limited employment that this business of transfer affords.

Examples are not wanting where the improvement of a harbor of this class, while it has led to a large increase in volume of freight handled, has actually diminished the total amount of money that the traffic left in the port. Obviously such commerce is of national and not local benefit, and if harbors or parts of harbors are specially devoted to this class of commerce alone, they could properly be provided and maintained at the national expense.

The next class of commerce is made up of things brought by vessel for local consumption or for local sale and distribution. This would comprise fuel, building materials, provisions, dry goods, machinery, and manufactured articles. The best results in this business require the wharves to be near the various trade centers, and a much greater number of wharves is needed than for an equal number of tons of specialized transfer freight. This kind of commerce has a much greater value locally than the mere transfer of freight, for it affords employment and profit to a great many more people. It is of general value and interest, too, for it is the marketing of distant products.

The third and last class of commerce is made up of raw material, which, on reaching the harbor either by land or water, as the case may be, is then manufactured or worked up into a higher class, and hence a more valuable product before being sent forward to its destination. It may be that it is wheat which is ground into flour, or corn distilled into alcohol, or timber manufactured into furniture, wagons, etc., or hides tanned into leather and made into shoes and harnesses and other articles, or cotton or wool that is converted into cloth, or the ores of metals that are reduced to the metallic state and afterwards made up into the thousands of articles of use and value for which the metals are employed, and then in the new and vastly more valuable state it is forwarded by the appropriate route to its destination. This kind of commerce is by far the most valuable of all from the local standpoint. It furnishes profit and employment to a great many people, and it is the thing that makes great cities possible. A ton of a certain commodity may leave at the place of manufacture an amount of money ten times or a hundred times greater than its value in the raw state. The general public has an interest in this, too, aside from the mere trade, because it makes for the general welfare that the processes of manufacture should be carried out at the place where of necessity there must be a change in the mode of transportation, since this reduces the number of handlings, and, other things being equal, it reduces also the cost of the finished product.

This is the commerce that is most desired by cities, and it requires for its successful development a very large amount of interior harbor frontage in order to bring the ship alongside the factory at eligible factory sites. It is this that creates the demand for interior basins and canals and for the excavation and development of creeks or little rivers penetrating deep into the heart of a city. The need is a real one, and such improvements are generally not without merit, but the question is by whom should such improvements be planned and by whom should they be executed.

There is another point that ought not to escape consideration, and that is the effect of these interior harbor developments upon real estate values. Land that is inaccessible, that is low and swampy, that borders upon the foul sloughs and creeks, may be transformed into eligible factory sites convenient to deep navigable water, and the whole adjacent territory, before of little value, becomes desirable for building sites for the added population that the new industries will draw, and an enormous increment of value may result from this effort in behalf of commerce. Indeed this increment may be so great as to become, in certain cases, the real motive that inspires the advocates of the harbor improvement. In other words, improved real estate values and not the increased demands of commerce may be the prime incentive. This phase should always be carefully considered. But, however worthy and necessary the proposed development may be, a large increase in riparian values must result from it, and there must be unearned increment for somebody.

In the ordinary improvements made in cities, such as the paving of streets, the laying of sewers, or the opening of parks, the property immediately benefited is made to pay a part at least of the cost of the improvement, and the city can in time recoup itself for the rest by the increased taxes that will follow from the added value of the property. In the improvement of a harbor the United States can not do this, for these things are out of reach of the General Government and can only be dealt with locally.

It follows, therefore, that in the case of harbors or parts of harbors devoted to the class of commerce destined for local consumption or distribution, or for local manufacture or milling in transit, there is a special local interest, advantage, and profit in excess of the general interest and value. There is a gain in which the general public does not and can not share, and there are sources of revenue resulting from such harbor development that are accessible to the local government, but are beyond the reach of the General Government. Therefore in the improvement and maintenance of harbors or parts of harbors where the commerce is of this character, there ought to be a division of cost between the local and the General Governments in a proportion that should bear the same relation that the local and special profit and value of the commerce bears to the general profit and value.

But how is this division of cost to be brought about? The United States can not impose a special tax upon a city or upon individuals who may be specially benefited by the improvements, and it can not compel the city to do it. Something has been accomplished by leaving to local interests the duty of providing wharves and terminals as well as land approaches and land routes. But this is not always enough, and sometimes a sort of division of work and cost has been attempted by the General Government when it has executed and maintained the exterior structures and approaches and left to the locality the duty of developing and caring for the inner harbor.

A fair, uniform, and equitable division applicable to all harbors is difficult to make. Harbors are too unlike in their physical conditions. Some require large and expensive breakwaters, others long channels of approach, costly to excavate and difficult to maintain; others extensive jetties and training walls, and when these exterior difficulties are overcome, little or nothing may be needed for the improvement of the inner harbor. On the other hand, a harbor may require no exterior works, or only such as present little difficulty and involve little expense, while the inner harbor or basin, the thing most indispensable and necessary to commerce, can only be secured and maintained with great difficulty and outlay.

This division of partnership, poor and unsatisfactory as it is, can only be brought about when the locality voluntarily consents to it. If the city fails to do its part, then the whole project of improvement comes to naught, and the money expended by the General Government is lost and wasted. Or if the city does its part in an unwise, imperfect, and inefficient manner, then the whole effort is to a corresponding extent impaired, crippled, and defeated. This is the natural consequence of a divided responsibility and control. It was pointed out at the outset how important it would be if all of the works and appliances that go to make up a complete and satisfactory harbor could be planned and executed under a single direction and control. Nevertheless, in the case of an inner harbor that penetrates the heart of a community or city there are many difficulties that arise that can not be properly handled except by the police power of the city, and that the Government can not suitably control without vexatious friction. Frequent bridges across such part of a harbor may be necessary for the community but detrimental to vessels, especially when the city wishes to keep these bridges closed during certain hours of the day. Again, deposits of sewage and refuse in the harbor cause shoals which the General Government should not be expected to remove, especially when the disposition of such material is of moment to the health of the community. The police power which the community has and which the General Government has not, makes it highly desirable that all work involving questions of this character be left to the locality to do.

In this connection it must also be borne in mind that there are few harbors whose commerce is not made up in varying proportions of all three of the general classes of commerce above described; also that harbors to-day largely devoted to mere transshipping may and probably will, by the development of additional industries and by the great growth of the country's commerce, soon become engaged to a controlling degree with commerce of great local benefit. Any rules to be of general application for the future must take into account this probability, and also the impracticability of obtaining money from Government sources alone with sufficient rapidity to keep up with the growth of the country's business. Additional harbor facilities of all kinds will be continually needed for many years to come and must be provided if the business of the country is not to suffer. The Government should not and will not neglect the national interest in these matters, and it should incline to the side of liberality, but the localities, corporations, and so forth, concerned should also assist all such needed developments to the extent to which they will profit by them.

It is recognized that there are a number of harbors of the first importance on the seaboard whose commerce is so general in character, whose international importance is so great, and in which the national interest is of such magnitude that rules applicable elsewhere perhaps can not advisedly be applied to them. The further development of such gateways could properly continue along the lines now in force, but harbors of less importance than these, and harbors on the Great Lakes, the bulk of whose commerce is domestic in character, require cooperation in their development if that development is to keep pace with the country's growth, and it is important that the interests which will profit from this development should proportionately aid in securing it.

Before proceeding further, it seems best to submit a brief description of the harbors in various parts of the country and a general statement of the amounts of money that the Government has expended on them.

On the Atlantic coast the physical and climatic conditions that affect harbors and their artificial improvements are, in the northern portions, frequent storms with much fog and thick weather during the winter season, and occasionally during severe winters the formation of ice, so as to interrupt or seriously impede navigation in the extreme northern harbors, though generally open navigation obtains throughout the year. In the southern part of the coast ice difficulties do not exist, and the season of the more violent storms is in the summer, when the tropical cyclones prevail. The tidal oscillation on the Atlantic coast is generally regular and diminishes in amount from the north, where it is considerable, to the southern portions, where tides are small. The number of natural bays, inlets, and river mouths susceptible of development as harbors is unusually large, and the commercial conditions are such as have demanded the utilization of practically all of them, as well as the construction of a few purely artificial harbors for refuge.

The approximate total number of harbors on this coast that have been improved by artificial works is 93, and the total amount appropriated by the Federal Government for this purpose to date is, in round numbers, about $76,000,000. The works of harbor improvement consist of breakwaters for creating artificial harbors of refuge, as at Sandy Bay, Point Judith, and the Delaware Bay harbor of refuge; of breakwaters to create and protect smaller commercial harbors, of which there are numerous examples on the New England coast; of jetties and contraction or regulating works for increasing the depth of the channel approach, as at Charleston and Savannah; and of dredging and rock excavation for increasing depth and width of channels within or leading to harbors and for increasing available harbor areas. Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Norfolk are the most important examples of harbors where the artificial improvement has consisted almost entirely of excavations to increase the depths and areas of water available for navigation, and in these as well as in several other harbors on the Atlantic coast the important works are designed to secure and maintain conditions that will accommodate the largest vessels yet built.

In some cases on the Atlantic coast the difficulties that it has been necessary to overcome by works of harbor improvement were inherent in the conditions of nature and in those attending the inauguration and normal development of commerce by vessels, as at Boston, New York, and Charleston, and in case of the harbors of refuge at Cape Ann and Delaware Bay; while for places like Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Jacksonville the need of harbor improvement work is attributable as much to the accidental location and subsequent growth of an important commercial center as to adverse natural conditions and increase in the size of ships.

No important harbor on the Atlantic coast has been improved wholly at local expense. The principal ones where improvements directly affecting navigation have been made partly at local expense are Boston, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Del., and Baltimore, and a number of small harbors in Massachusetts have been improved at the expense of the State. With these exceptions, the improvements on any considerable scale that have so far been made have been at the expense of the United States.

The harbors on the Gulf of Mexico present the general characteristics of shores of low relief consisting largely of sand, deficient natural depths, a small tidal oscillation, freedom from ice, and exposure to sudden and violent tropical storms that frequently produce great variations in the sea level with damaging results. The harbor improvement work consists principally of jetties to increase depths at harbor entrances by natural scour and to maintain depths obtained by dredging, as at Galveston and the mouths of the Mississippi River, and of extensive dredging alone or in connection with protecting jetties and other works, as at Mobile, Pensacola, Sabine Pass, Tampa Bay, and Key West. The depths contemplated by the improvements of the Gulf harbors are generally somewhat less than for the larger harbors of the Atlantic coast. All these improvements have been made at the expense of the United States, except that considerable work at local expense has been done at Galveston, mouth of Brazos River, Aransas Pass, Port Arthur, and Sabine Pass. The improvements at Galveston and New Orleans have been assisted by the respective municipalities, but the other improvement work in the Gulf harbors, other than at Government expense, has been mostly done by private interests and corporations. The work of improvement at New Orleans Harbor proper has consisted entirely in protecting the banks of the river from erosion and caving. This has been done jointly by the United States and the local authorities.

The approximate total number of harbors on the Gulf coast that have been improved by artificial works is 11, and the total amount appropriated by the Federal Government for this purpose to date is, in round numbers, about $23,500,000.

The Pacific coast possesses comparatively few natural harbors or localities where it is practicable to build artificial ones. The rugged nature of the topography along the coast and the limited resources of most of the adjacent country have limited the demands for the development or creation of numerous harbors. There are no ice difficulties, but the whole coast is more or less exposed to violent storms and heavy seas, and in the northern part fog and thick weather prevail during portions of the year, and difficulties of navigation are increased sometimes by heavy smoke from forest fires. The tidal oscillation is large and very irregular.

The works of harbor improvement present a great variety, including those at San Francisco and Seattle, which are natural harbors requiring little improvement except wharf construction and development of interior slips and channels, the extensive breakwater at San Pedro, the sea jetties at Humboldt Bay, mouth of Columbia River, and Grays Harbor; and large works of dredging, partly in connection with land reclamation, with auxiliary construction at the inner harbors and channels of Oakland, Seattle, and Tacoma. Mention should also be made of the works of improving the channel in San Pablo Bay by dredging, and the works on the lower Willamette and Columbia Rivers to improve the approach to Portland Harbor.

Important works at private expense have been done on an extensive scale at San Pedro Harbor and vicinity and others are projected. A private company is engaged in constructing a separate harbor at Long Beach, near San Pedro inner harbor, on which a shipbuilding plant is in operation. Works of improvement at San Diego Harbor are under contemplation by the State harbor board, and at San Francisco extensive work at local expense has been done and is in progress in the way of developing the wharves and slips.

In the State of Oregon extensive contributions have been made to improving the lower Willamette and Columbia Rivers by the "port of Portland," and action has been taken by the State under which it is expected that funds will be raised by local taxation to assist in improving several other harbors. At Tacoma and Seattle contributions have been made by local interests to improving inner channels. Except as above, most of the Pacific coast harbor improvements have been made by the General Government.

The approximate total number of harbors on the Pacific coast that have been improved by artificial works is 13, and the total amount appropriated by the Federal Government for this purpose to date is, in round numbers, about $15,000,000. Nearly all the important harbors on this coast are designed to accommodate vessels of the largest type and deepest draft.

In one respect the harbors of the Great Lakes differ from those of the coast, in that they are frozen up for about four months each year, and for this period they serve only as winter quarters or ice harbors for vessels, while on the seacoasts all harbors are open throughout the year with very few exceptions. The Lakes have no sensible daily tidal oscillation, but the available harbor depths are affected by the seasonal variations in water level. The artificial channels of the chain of lakes enforce certain restrictions on the dimensions and build of the vessels which indirectly affect the requirements as to harbors. In length and beam the Lake vessels now approach the largest vessels on the sea, but their draft is less. Ocean-going vessels are naturally more seaworthy than the Lake boats would be under corresponding conditions, but the requirements for harbors of refuge and for protection for vessels at commercial harbors are based on much the same principles as those that obtain in case of harbors on the seacoast. Conditions of weather seriously adverse to navigation for the type of vessel employed often prevail on the Lakes during the season of navigation. These include violent storms and heavy seas, and smoke, fog, and thick weather. When navigation is closed, safe winter harbors for the vessels are required.

The approximate total number of harbors on the American shores of the Great Lakes that have been improved by artificial works is 78, and the total amount appropriated by the Federal Government for this purpose to date is, in round numbers, about $75,000,000.

From the wording of the law the board feels that its duties have to do primarily with the harbors of the Great Lakes, and a more detailed description of these harbors seems desirable before passing to the consideration of their further improvement.

It is impossible to discuss, in an intelligible way, the improvement of the harbors on the Great Lakes without first giving some consideration to the history of the harbors and the region which they serve, and without offering some reasons why they were originally selected for improvement and why the particular methods and materials which have been used for their betterment were selected.

None of these harbors were originally planned to meet conditions at all comparable with those now existing. In their natural condition the Great Lakes offered very few safe and commodious harbors which were of sufficient depth to be used by any vessel suitable for lake navigation, and none at all which could be used by vessels of the present time. Shelter from storms and waves could be had within the mouths of the tributary streams and sometimes in the bays or indentations of the shore line. These rivers and bays were generally deep enough for the small ships then in use, but their entrances from the lake were almost invariably obstructed or completely closed by bars formed by the joint action of waves and currents at or near the line of the lake shore. During the season when storms were most prevalent on the Lakes the waves washed up the sand and gravel and almost completely closed the mouths of the streams, but during the times of freshets the volume of water discharged by these streams was generally sufficient to cut its way through the bars and to afford and maintain, for a time, channels deep enough to permit the passage of the small craft which were likely to use them.

The bars which separated the bays from the Lakes were generally more permanent in character and higher in relief than those at the mouths of the river, and channels more or less tortuous and uncertain always existed across these bars, through which the water ebbed and flowed as was necessary to maintain the level between the bays and the Lakes. All of these channels were constantly shifting, were of uncertain and varying depth, and liable to be obliterated temporarily by the action of any sudden storm. Such as they were, however, they were of necessity made use of by the first comers.

When the settlement of the region bordering upon the Lakes had advanced so far that the population produced something in excess of its own requirements and found it necessary to transport its product to market by water, the need of better harbors became imperative. Between 1820 and 1830 the improvement of a large number of harbors on the Lakes was planned, and the actual work of betterment was undertaken at several of them. Where, as was generally the case, the proposed harbor was in the mouth of a river, the effort toward improvement was directed to doing away with the river bar, and this was effected by the construction of jetties extending outward into the lake, so as to prolong the natural banks of the river and to confine its discharge to a channel of moderate width. The result was invariably to secure a better and deeper entrance; and if the material composing the bar was such that the current of the river could move it, the bar was completely washed away and a channel secured and maintained between the jetties as wide and deep as the discharge of the river was capable of producing. In the case of harbors in bays, jetties were also made use of, and these were reinforced by similar structures built along the crest of the bar so as to prevent new channels from cutting through it and to confine the ebb and flow due to other causes than tides to a single, well-defined entrance

The necessity for rapid construction, for great economy due to small appropriations, and the lack, in a new country, of skilled artificers led to the use of timber for the construction of these jetties and shore arms. The subaqueous portion was built up of separate timber cribs, made of logs flattened upon two sides and notched together in much the same way that the log cabins of the time were built. These cribs were rectangular in form and were of the length of a single log, i. e., 20 to 30 feet. They were strengthened by a longitudinal wall and one or more cross walls, also built of logs. The logs were fastened together with wooden pins. The structures were generally built without bottoms. They were floated into position and sunk upon the natural bottom of the lake and filled with small stone gathered from the shore or from the fields. The superstructure was generally built of sawed timber and was made continuous over a series of cribs. The side and cross walls were generally a foot thick and were carried up so as to give the jetty a height of 6 or 7 feet above the ordinary level of the lake. The superstructure was then filled with small stone and the whole was planked over to form a deck.

This method of construction has generally been continued ever since, but the cribs are now built with sawn timber, are strengthened with corner posts, sheathed with hardwood plank, and driftbolts and screw bolts have taken the place of wooden pins. The cribs are generally sunk upon a prepared foundation, either of riprap or piling. They are made much longer also than was first the case, and, generally, are provided with bottoms sufficiently tight to hold the filling of stone.

An increasing commerce led to the adoption of larger vessels upon the Lakes until finally the vessels attained a size and draft too great to enter the channel between the jetties. Resort was then had to dredging. The harbors were gradually deepened from 10 to 12 to 16 feet, and finally to 21 or 22 feet. Until this maximum depth was sought, the natural depth in the harbors and bays was generally sufficient, and no dredging was necessary inside the natural lake-shore line.

Jetties have now lost their primitive function, which was an active one, viz, to scour out a channel by the force of the natural currents, and have become simply conservative in their nature, their office being simply to protect the artificial channels which have been secured and are now maintained by dredging. In order that the original jetties should be effective, the distance between them necessarily could not greatly exceed the natural width of the stream the entrance to which they were designed to improve. This limited the distance between them from 120 to perhaps 250 feet, and this latter width was seldom exceeded. This narrow entrance was difficult for vessels to make when driven toward the shore by a strong wind, and if a sailing vessel under such circumstances failed to make the harbor it was almost certain to be wrecked upon the beach. This led to the construction of breakwaters out in the lake and generally lying on the most exposed side of the jetty entrance. The breakwater was connected with the land by a shore arm, thus forming an L-shaped structure, the angle of the L turned in the direction of the greatest wind exposure. It was thought that sailing vessels could easily gain the shelter of this structure and there drop anchor and await a favorable time for entering the commercial harbor.

These structures did not prove altogether satisfactory. While they sheltered an area from a certain direction of wind, they left it exposed to winds coming from other directions and made it a place rather dangerous for vessels to lie. This has generally been met by building a similar structure symmetrically disposed on the other side of the jetty entrance, and it has been the belief and the hope of the Government that these sheltered areas would be made use of for commercial purposes; that wharves would be erected along the shore under shelter of the breakwater, and the narrow and unsatisfactory harbor afforded by the river would gain relief in this way. But, contrary to the expectation of the Government, this has not been done, and we find the sheltered areas under the breakwaters at Oswego, Buffalo, Cleveland, Chicago, and Milwaukee comparatively little used. The breakwater affords an anchoring place for yachts, generally shelters the boathouse of the local yacht club, a part of the area is used for abandoned hulks and wrecks, and much of the lake shore is utilized, or an effort is made to utilize it, for park purposes.

Such is the present condition of harbors on the Great Lakes, and it is seen that the first improvements which were necessary were wholly outside of the natural shore line of the lake. There was no occasion for the United States to expend any money in improving the harbor inside of this line. Therefore in almost all of the lake harbors the policy has been followed of limiting appropriations and improvements made by the National Government to work in the lake. When the necessity for greater depth in the river forced itself upon the local community, then this community has generally found the means for deepening the river, and only in a very few instances has the United States come to its relief. Meanwhile the traffic of the Lakes has grown; starting from nothing there has been built up an inland waterborne commerce that has never before been approached in magnitude and value in the world's history. Most of the Lake harbors are congested and physically inadequate for existing traffic, and this traffic is growing and will probably continue to grow for many years. The time has arrived when a definite policy should be adopted for dealing with the harbors that serve this commerce. The problem is too great a one to be dealt with by the General Government alone, and cooperation must be had from the localities and corporations that will profit from this increasing commerce

It is not for the United States to dictate to communities what measures should be taken, but these communities, having police powers and means of taxation which the United States has not, and being able to recoup themselves through increasing land values and otherwise, should themselves rise to the situation and, in cooperation with the railroads and other large corporations interested, should put their harbors in shape for the economical handling of the business that is coming. Otherwise they must be prepared to see themselves distanced by rival communities with greater enterprise. In this way, and in this way alone, can the needed development be attained as rapidly as it will be needed. The United States can not well do for one locality what it refuses to do for another, and if it is expected that the United States is to do all of the work that will be required at all localities the expenditure that would be necessary would be manifestly prohibitive. The United States should be as liberal as possible, and so far as practicable its liberality should be somewhat in proportion to the enterprise shown by the localities themselves.

The board, after mature consideration of the many complicated questions involved and with the view of causing harbor facilities to be increased as rapidly as they are going to be needed, recommends the establishing of the following uniform rules in making harbor improvements hereafter:

1. That the advisability or inadvisability of the Government's undertaking any work at any harbor be determined in the manner now established by existing law and practice.

2. That no work of construction or maintenance be undertaken by the Government at any harbor constructed by and operated in the interest of a corporation or private person and adapted to the promotion of such interest only.

3. That the work of the Government at any harbor be confined to the general part of the harbor, including, as may be necessary, the construction and maintenance of breakwaters with the general anchorage area protected thereby, of entrance piers and jetties at the mouths of inner channels, and the portion of such channels immediately between them, and also of such long general channels of approach as may be necessary to connect the harbor with outside deep water.

With regard to the first provision of the law, regarding those harbors in which the whole or part of the harbor is improved at local expense, the board recommends that the improvements so made by local authorities should not be undertaken or maintained by the General Government.

Respectfully submitted.

THE BOARD OF ENGINEERS FOR RIVERS AND HARBORS,
Washington, May 16, 1910.

Respectfully returned to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors has reviewed the report of the special board appointed to report upon the following item of law contained in the river and harbor act of March 3, 1909:

"The Secretary of War is authorized to appoint a board of engineers to examine those harbors on the Great Lakes and elsewhere in which the whole or a part of the harbor is improved at local expense, which board shall make recommendations with a view to determining whether the improvements so made by local authorities should be undertaken or maintained by the General Government and to establish uniform rules in making harbor improvements."

The report of the special board, after discussing the subject at length, concludes with the following recommendations covering the several questions involved:

"1. That the advisability or inadvisability of the Government's undertaking any work at any harbor be determined in the manner now established by existing laws and practice.

"2. That no work of construction or maintenance be undertaken by the Government at any harbor constructed by and operated in the interest of a corporation or private person and adapted to the promotion of such interest only.

"3. That the work of the Government at any harbor be confined to the general part of the harbor, including, as may be necessary, the construction and maintenance of breakwaters with the general anchorage area protected thereby, of entrance piers and jetties at the mouths of inner channels, and the portion of such channels immediately between them, and also of such long general channels of approach as may be necessary to connect the harbor with outside deep water.

"With regard to the first provision of the law, regarding those harbors in which the whole or part of the harbor is improved at local expense, the board recommends that the improvements so made by local authorities should not be undertaken or maintained by the General Government."

After careful consideration of the report of the special board this board concurs in the principles and recommendations contained in items 1 and 2, quoted above. The board also concurs in the general principles enunciated in item 3 and in the final paragraph relating to harbors, in which the whole or part of the harbor is improved at local expense. It recognizes, however, that there may be instances in which the interests of the general public will not require a rigid application of the principles stated in item 3. It also recognizes that there may be exceptional cases in which improvements made by local interests will fall within the class of works deemed proper for the General Government to undertake or maintain or that will so conform to an advantageous project for further improvement of the locality as to merit special consideration.

For the board:

WM. T. ROSSELL,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers,
Senior Member of the Board.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed to say in the gentleman's time, because I do not wish to take up the time of the committee needlessly, as I am in favor of having this bill disposed of in the next hour or so, I would like to say even during Mr. Burton's time, if the gentleman will inquire minutely into some of the maintenance projects on the Great Lakes, he will find that with some of the smaller harbors they have been maintained by the National Government. What I am saying is that you are not adopting a uniform policy and have discriminated as to maintenance against the many inner harbors on the Great Lakes.

Mr. SMALL. I understand the gentleman, but the gentleman's harbor is one of those that is favored because provision is made.

Mr. STAFFORD. The harbor at Milwaukee is not favored; there has not been one cent expended by the Government on the inner harbor, notwithstanding its great commerce.

Mr. SMALL. Is the gentleman quite sure?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am quite positive.

Mr. SMALL. Well, then, if he is sure, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the manner indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I rise to move to strike out the last word. I simply want to be inserted at this point in the RECORD the fact or the statement confirmatory of the statement made a moment ago by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina, about the funds available for the completion of the Arrowhead project. I had a conversation to-day with Col. Taylor, of the Engineer's Office, War Department, and he informed me substantially as the gentleman from North Carolina that there will be approximately from $140,000 to $150,000 on hand in the aggregate there which will suffice for the coming season.

Mr. SMALL. Both under contract and not under contract, part under contract and part not.

The Clerk read as follows:

Chicago and Calumet Harbors, Chicago and Illinois Rivers, Ill.; Calumet River, Ill. and Ind.; and Indiana and Michigan City Harbors, Ind.: For maintenance, $110,000; completing improvement of Calumet Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 237, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $38,170; in all, $148,170. The unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made for the improvement of Chicago Harbor is hereby made available for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1303, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. The unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made for improvement of Chicago River is hereby made available for improvement and maintenance in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1294, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. The unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made for improvement of Indiana Harbor is hereby made available for improvement in accordance with the report submitted in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 6, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read in my time a letter which I received from the president of the West Kentucky Coal Co. in reference to the lack of appropriation for the Ohio River in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter in the gentleman's time.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY rose.

Mr. SMALL. Does the gentleman desire time?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. Does the gentleman care to take it on this or on the next item?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Either on this or the next item.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have five minutes on this paragraph.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WEST KENTUCKY COAL CO.,
Sturgis, Ky., January 9, 1919.

Hon. A. W. BARKLEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You no doubt are familiar with the recent rivers and harbors bill, there not being any appropriation made for the improvement of the Ohio River other than the unexpended appropriations which have been tied up under contract for the Ohio River improvement.

The improvements on the Ohio River are of vital importance to all of the people who live on the Ohio and adjacent to it, and inasmuch as about one-sixth of the population of the whole United States live in the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys it seems to me that the benefits that these citizens can derive from having the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers made navigable continuously during the year are such that our Representatives in Congress should not overlook the importance of making the necessary appropriations to complete the great work that has already been begun in order that the public may have the benefit of these great waterways.

The West Kentucky Coal Co. is especially interested in the improvement of the lower Ohio as well as the Mississippi River, but more especially in the lower Ohio. Under ordinary conditions we transport half a million tons of coal down the Ohio River from our mines located near Caseyville, Ky., and on account of the present river condition we are only permitted to operate approximately seven months in the year, and these operating months are contingent on the flood stages of the water. With the proper improvements we could have continuous operation and could transport one and a half million tons of coal with the same equipment that we now have, and I am sadly disappointed that no appropriation was made in this session of Congress to take care of the necessary improvements on the lower Ohio.

With the present high labor cost on railroads, as well as the congestion of the railroads at various periods of the year, it makes it more necessary that improved river transportation should receive the necessary attention. In periods of car shortage, as well as other transportation facilities, if the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers were put in the condition in which they can be put at a normal cost, then the citizens living along these two great rivers could be served not only with coal but with various other commodities which have been most difficult for them to get transported to the towns and cities bordering these two rivers; and with these increased transportation facilities better car supply, as well as motive power, could be diverted to other localities where they would be needed.

I earnestly request that you use every effort in your power to see that something is done at the next session of Congress, and if possible at the present session, to have the necessary appropriations made for a continuance of the improvements of the lower Ohio River and not have it delayed for two or three generations to come. This country is in need of this improvement, and it should be given immediate attention; and if the necessary appropriations are made, it would help solve the great question of what are we going to do to find work for the returning soldiers.

I am attaching a copy of resolutions which were passed at the Ohio Valley Improvement Association meeting, and while these resolutions are modest in their suggestions they represent the feeling and best judgment of representative men from Pittsburgh to Cairo; and I am sure that the body of men that assembled at Louisville on December 11 and 12, 1918, went there with no selfish motives, but with the idea in view of trying to put before Congress the feeling and best judgment of the entire public who live in the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys.

Trusting that your efforts can be depended upon to see that these resolutions are acted upon, I am,

Yours, very truly,

C. F. RICHARDSON,
President.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that a copy of these resolutions of the Ohio Valley Improvement Association be printed in the RECORD following the letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that a copy of the resolutions he referred to be printed in the RECORD following the letter. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there has been a good deal of discussion at times in the House when the river and harbor bill was under consideration as to the amount of commerce which is obtained on rivers or harbors which are improved. And also a good deal of discussion to the effect that, owing to railroad competition, the improvement of rivers and harbors does not bring water commerce commensurate with the improvement. The paragraph which was just read carries an item for the Calumet Harbor, situated in Chicago. The Calumet River is a little river that runs from Indiana into Illinois and out to Lake Michigan. A few years ago there was no commerce there. There were a number of railroads there and there are a number of railroads there now in south Chicago, comprising railroads like the New York Central, the Pennsylvania, and Baltimore & Ohio, as well as various western roads, and belt lines which connect all the railroads with the Calumet Harbor and River.

Notwithstanding railroad competition, notwithstanding that the water competition is direct with the railroad competition, the commerce there now amounts to over 10,000,000 tons a year, wholly dependent upon the improvement of the Calumet River and Harbor. And if the improvement had not proceeded ahead of the commerce there never could have been any commerce there. Commerce followed the improvement. It followed, I may say, fairly rapidly, notwithstanding the railroad competition.

Gentlemen who believe it is impossible to develop water commerce at any point in competition with the railroads will have a living illustration that it can be accomplished where the conditions demand it. I do not know as to many of the items in this bill or the desirability of endeavoring to obtain water commerce in competition with the railroads at various places, but certainly there are cases, and certainly this is one, where the development has been a wise development; the expenditure has been a wise expenditure by the Government. This water competition from the Calumet Harbor, affecting the grain rates from the West to the East, has not only developed an immense water commerce, but has had the effect of duly reducing railroad rates on grains and other commodities passing from the West to the East around the south end of Lake Michigan, and likewise of coal and other articles going from the East toward the West.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman not take it on another paragraph? Debate on this has been exhausted.

Mr. SWITZER. I would like to have unanimous consent. I was not present, and I would like to say something about the Ohio River situation. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement read by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] I think it is due that some reason be stated why there is no appropriation recommended at this time to the pending bill for the Ohio River.

The Chief of Engineers, appearing before the committee, stated the unexpended balance on hand, amounting to something in the neighborhood of $10,000,000, was ample to do all the work that the Government could do in the next year or a year and a half with the equipment it had on hand or could secure, and that there would be no need for an additional appropriation unless contractors who had heretofore made bids to build dams and partial construction of dams on the Ohio River would evince some disposition to make a reasonable bid. And the Chief of Engineers assured us that when the bill reached the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, if any contractor who had heretofore been doing river-improvement work on the Ohio River would make some reasonable bid, even for partial construction of dams, there would be a recommendation made by the engineers for some million dollars additional appropriation. Certainly there should not be money appropriated unless there could be reasonable assurance given us that the money can be expended in the next year and a half. Conditions have been so abnormal, labor so scarce, material so high, that many contractors on the river have practically failed in doing Government work, and very few men manifest a disposition to make offers to do contract work at this time. And, as I understand it, about the only work that will go on is the work directly under the engineers, with Government equipment.

I desire to say a word at this time in reference to a matter brought to the attention of the committee by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. I do not doubt his statement. While I think probably, and know, there should be some investigation made along the lines mentioned, yet I do not think that should detract from the merits of the Muscle Shoals proposition as a power-producing proposition.

I have visited Muscle Shoals. Of course, my judgment may be erroneous, but I believe that the possibilities are great for the development of water power at Muscle Shoals. I am one of those who believe that where a great water power can be developed in the United States it should be done, even if it is to be done with Government money. I do not believe, merely because Congress in the past has turned down some proposition, that Congress, in the future or now, should turn it down. It seems to me as though gentlemen who in the past have voted against appropriating money to develop water power at Muscle Shoals, when the labor could have been procured cheaply and the work done more cheaply than it can be done now or in the future, will find themselves in a hole when there is an agitation on throughout the country for the development of water power in this country and it must be done at a greatly increased cost. I think it has been a mistake on the part of Congress in the past to turn down this joint proposition to not only improve the navigation of the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, but along with it jointly to develop the great possibilities of water power.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. I do.

Mr. KEARNS. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] to say that 8 or 10 men down there invested about $1,000 in this project.

Mr. SWITZER. I am not defending men who may be grafting on the Government at the present time. What may be true with respect to Muscle Shoals is true practically at every cantonment—practically everything that has been done in the last year and a half. But because there are grafters in the country is, to my mind, no reason why the merits of Muscle Shoals should be disparaged. As I understood him, the gentleman from Ohio said this company would receive something like $2,000,000 in royalties.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. SWITZER. He said this company will receive something like $2,000,000 royalties. Is that correct?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Substantially.

Mr. KEARNS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, if I do not object will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SWITZER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWITZER. As I understand the gentleman from Ohio, he believes that the production of nitrates at Muscle Shoals is going to be a success and is going to make for somebody a large amount of money. It may be that they are going to receive profits in some illegitimate way. I am not disputing that. But if it is true, if there is to be $2,000,000 of profits in royalties on the nitrate to be produced at Muscle Shoals, then it is evident that nitrates will be produced at Muscle Shoals; and I want to say that I am in favor of producing all the nitrate you can in this country for the purpose of furnishing a cheaper fertilizer. [Applause.] I think that Congress can do nothing better than to pursue every possibility that will tend to cheapen the production of fertilizer and make better fertilizer in this country.

Why, you gentlemen, everyone of you, two or three years ago received letters from a nitrate importing company in New York City, who said that this nitrate proposition would fail; that the Government could not produce nitrate. Yet these importers wanted us to vote down the Muscle Shoals proposition and similar propositions. Why? Because they said it would interfere with their nitrate importation from, and trade with, Chile. I then made up my mind that if Muscle Shoals would be a failure, it would not be a failure so far as the production of nitrate is concerned, because, otherwise, these importers would not be objecting to an attempt to produce nitrate in this country if the proposed proposition would be a failure. While it may be true that some men may receive abnormal profits—I do not know anything about that proposition; it may be that somebody has "got next," and probably is going to make more out of this proposition than he should make—yet I do not think it should disparage Muscle Shoals as a power-producing proposition. I understand it will save the consumption of something like 6,000,000 bushels or 8,000,000 bushels of coal annually in this country. Although I oppose reckless waste of public money, especially in furtherance solely of some private enterprise, still I favor the Muscle Shoals power-development proposition and every proposition that will tend to cheapen the cost of the production of fertilizer in this country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, we wish to complete this bill this evening in so far as we can, and it is the desire that gentlemen confine their remarks to the bill. We have all endeavored to be as generous as we could to the membership of the House and made no point of order when gentlemen have discussed subjects not connected with the bill. We did not want to curtail discussion along any line. But I hope from this time on gentlemen will confine their discussion to bonafide amendments to the bill in order that we may make progress and complete the bill to-night.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Let me say to the gentleman that I think it is the feeling of some gentlemen here, or a good many, that while they would be willing to stay and complete the reading of the bill they do not want to vote on the passage of the bill, or on a motion to recommit, until Monday morning.

Mr. GARNER. Why should we not get through with it to-night?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am making this suggestion on the part of others. As far as I am concerned, I would be willing to complete it.

Mr. SMALL. If we can get the bill completed and report it back to the House we will have made substantial progress.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman from North Carolina state whether that is the program, to report it back and adjourn, or does he expect to get a final vote on the passage of the bill to-night?

Mr. SMALL. Does not the gentleman think it would be wise to pass the bill to-night?

Mr. TREADWAY. Suppose the question was brought up that no quorum was present.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 12 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, a great many of us in the House interested in this bill believed when the statement was made the other day that a vote would be taken to-day. We knew that on Monday there would be general debate, and many of us have made arrangements to transact official business outside of the city on Monday. If the bill goes over until Monday it will be a hardship on these Members. I know that some Republican Members have gone away knowing that they left old war horses enough here to put it off until Monday, and they would not be here, but I do not see why when we depended on the statement of the chairman that there would be a vote to-day we should not have it. I am willing to stay here and have a call of the House and send for these Republicans——

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I object to such a statement being made on the floor.

Mr. SMALL. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that all this debate is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 12 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, since this bill has been under consideration I have been engaged as one of the conferees on the revenue bill and have not been able for that reason to take part in the discussion. My knowledge of what has occurred is confined to my reading of the RECORD each day. I have noticed the frequent references of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to the proposed barge line on the Mississippi River. Evidently the gentleman from Wisconsin does not understand the proposition. Therefore I conceive it to be my duty to explain to this House the barge-line proposition on the Mississippi River, which may revolutionize river traffic in the United States. I am unwilling that this important matter should be misrepresented in this debate.

The gentleman from Wisconsin referred in this connection to the alleged fact that the Government has turned over $3,360,000 to the Hon. Edward F. Goltra, of St. Louis, whom he describes in one place as a Democratic State committeeman and in another place as the chairman of the Democratic national committee and in another place as chairman of the Democratic State committee of Missouri.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, I think the gentleman is mistaken about that; I never said he was chairman of the national committee.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The gentleman made that statement yesterday, and the report of the debate on page 1229 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that he did. But that is immaterial. Mr. Goltra holds none of these positions and never did, and not one cent has been turned over to him in any way. I merely call attention to these statements to show how inaccurate the gentleman is. Mr. Goltra is a member of the Democratic National Committee from the State of Missouri, but this fund is not turned over to him on account of any such consideration as that.

Edward F. Goltra is one of the great iron masters of the United States, and he has conceived a plan which will revolutionize, I believe, not only the manufacture of iron in the United States, but the navigation of our rivers.

The proposition to which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] refers so often and about which he understands so little is this: The original proposition was to build 24 barges and 3 steamers. In its modified form it contemplates the building of 19 barges and 3 steamers. Three million three hundred and sixty thousand dollars has been allotted for that purpose by the Shipping Board. The 19 barges are now in process of construction at Dubuque, Pittsburgh, and at two other points on our western rivers. Twelve of them are 65 per cent completed and they will all be completed in the month of April of this year. They are 300 feet long and 48 feet wide. The reason why the number of barges has been decreased from 24 to 19 is to leave a margin of funds for the purpose of constructing along the river at points where they may be needed great steel unloading devices, supplied with 10-ton steel shovels, capable of unloading one of these barges in a few minutes of time. These great steel unloading devices or tracks extend out into the river and the barge is run between the outer supports of the tracks and the bank of the river, and these great traveling 10-ton steel shovels empty the barges in a few movements, depositing along the track the ore or the coal——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time on this paragraph be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The cargo can be deposited by these traveling shovels in railroad cars or in any other way along the banks of the river. The barges draw 4 feet of water, and at low water carry 1,000 tons of coal or of iron ore; that is, at the low water which prevails in the Mississippi River in the latter part of August and the early part of the month of September. During the remaining period of time they carry much larger loads than this.

The steamers, which will soon be in process of construction, to be used in moving these barges are constructed of a type absolutely new in the United States and, so far as I know, new in the world. They are 265 feet long and have a beam of 58 feet, and operate in three feet and a half of water. There are no similar tugboats in use at the present time on any of our rivers. In addition to the ordinary rudder, they are fitted with what are known as monkey rudders or Yukon rudders, which are double rudders operating behind the propelling wheels, and with this steering device it is possible to operate these great steamers in three feet and a half of water and still move successfully six of these loaded barges. The project is to start these steamers out from St. Louis loaded down with coal and drawing four feet and a half of water. They carry enough coal to enable them to make the round trip to Minneapolis and back to St. Louis, and when they get back to St. Louis they will be drawing 3½ feet of water and they will push six of these great steel barges drawing 4 feet of water.

This fleet of barges, propelled by one of these steamers, can carry more ore in one trip by 3,600 tons than can be carried on the largest of the ore-carrying steamers on the Lakes. At a moderate stage of water one of these fleets propelled by one of these steamers on the Mississippi River will carry as much iron ore as can be carried on 300 50-foot freight cars, and will move down the river as fast as any freight train can move. In other words, one of these steamers will bring down the river at one load the equivalent of seven long trainloads of ore. The project is to have no empty barges going back to Minneapolis, but to carry back to Minneapolis the coal from the coal fields of Illinois for the great northwestern section of the United States, and unloading devices are already being arranged at the city of Minneapolis for the purpose of unloading this coal.

The project which Mr. Goltra has conceived contemplates assembling iron ore, coking coal, and manganese at the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, bringing it there by a haul which is almost a complete water haul. We find that we have coking coal in the State of Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time on the paragraph be extended for four minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman starts will he please tell how much more they carry at good water than at low water? The gentleman stated more than 1,000 tons, but did not state how much more.

Mr. SMALL. Reserving the right to object, could the gentleman get along with less?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Perhaps I will be able to do so; I will do my very best to get through in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. At an ordinary stage of water each of these barges will carry nearly 2,000 tons of ore; at a flood stage each barge will carry 2,600 tons. The project is to assemble at St. Louis, Mo., manganese and iron ore and coking coal, and by using modern by-product ovens we find that we have coking coal in Franklin County, Ill., a short railroad haul of 50 or 60 miles, and this coal can be brought to Chester, Ill., 60 miles below St. Louis, and loaded on these barges. We propose to bring manganese from Cuba, unload by floating derricks at New Orleans on these river barges, and then bring it on up the river to St. Louis. In the summer time these barges will be occupied in bringing iron ore from the North, and their return cargoes will consist of coal for the great Northwest.

In the wintertime these barges will be operated on the lower Mississippi River carrying coal to New Orleans and will bring manganese from Cuba and coking coal from Franklin County, Ill., to the city of St. Louis. We propose to manufacture iron in the city of St. Louis, by this inexpensive method of assembling the material, cheaper than it can be manufactured in any other section of the United States. It is 650 miles down the river from the point where the iron ore will be loaded on the barges to St. Louis. It is a thousand miles from the Lake Superior points nearest to the iron-ore section of the Northwest to the Lake Erie points nearest to Pittsburgh. It is 850 miles from these points on Lake Superior to Gary, Ind., and in order to load on Lake steamers for Gary or Lake Erie points the railroad haul is something like 150 miles from that section of the Mesaba Range from which they are compelled to get ore. The railroad haul from the ore fields to the point of loading on the Mississippi River is only a hundred miles.

This in brief is the proposition which we who live along the greatest of our rivers and who are studying its problems believe will result in a tremendous economic saving to this country in the matter of iron production and will result in time in revolutionizing the method of navigating the rivers of the United States. The gentleman from Wisconsin before many years, before many days have passed, will see this great fleet of steel barges in operation on the Mississippi River and in successful operation. The competition of the railroads has nothing to do with freight of this kind. Arrangements have already been made for this trade. The blast furnaces are ready and will be in operation in May, and then the gentleman from Wisconsin will be surprised, and equally surprised, I have no doubt, to find soon the river which for 200 miles flows past the boundary of the great State which in part he represents here carrying a tonnage which he seems never to have even dreamed of. [Applause.]

Hon. Edward F. Goltra, with splendid patriotism, has entered upon this project, which will in a few years make the city of St. Louis one of the great iron-producing centers of the continent. This project makes possible the utilization of every mile of the great Mississippi River from the head of navigation to the Gulf of Mexico. It makes possible cheaper coal and more coal for the great city of New Orleans and all its industries; it makes possible cheaper coal and more coal for the great Northwest. In this age of iron it makes possible cheaper iron for the industries of all the States. The rivers are coming into their own again, and the Mississippi River barge line systems may in the very near future be extended to the other great rivers which between our mountain ranges flow down to the sea. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois had been present during the discussion he would have heard everything that I read into the RECORD from the Engineer's Report to-day, which can not be gainsaid, and in addition to that let me say that Mr. Goltra came to my office, in addition to the hearing before the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and I know his proposition completely, as well as does the gentleman who just spoke. I have understood it completely, and the best opinion of experts with whom I have conferred is that Mr. Goltra is going to be disappointed with his new type of boat for the Mississippi. But that is neither here nor there. I hope he will not be disappointed and that he may be successful. I hope so. Others desired that same opportunity to lease these boats. Mr. Goltra was given the advantage, and he now has it, and he must make good. He expects to buy the boats at one-half the cost of construction, and so states——

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I can not unless I can get more time. The gentleman has used 14 minutes and the discussion of this is all in the RECORD. Read the RECORD in regard to it.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The last statement is not true.

Mr. FREAR. That statement is true, and I put it in the RECORD in Mr. Goltra's own words. You will find it in the permanent RECORD.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I can not unless I get the time. I have been held to five minutes, and I want to talk about another subject. If the gentleman will take my statement, he will find that it is absolutely so, and I know as much about it—that is, about the Goltra proposition—I believe I do, as does the gentleman from Illinois.

I believe I do. I hope Mr. Goltra is going to be successful. But that is neither here nor there. The minority leader a few moments ago made a statement that I want to refer to briefly. He said on the Calumet Harbor and River they have about 10,000,000 tons, and that was an evidence of what could be brought about by putting in the improvement before institutions went in to create commerce. That is true; but it would not have been an improvement at that point if it had not been known that those great steel mills were to be constructed at Calumet Harbor. And there is another and a basic reason that the ships on the ocean and large boats that use the ship canals on the Lakes can make a success of transportation, as we know, and can compete with the railroads, and that is the case in Calumet Harbor.

When it comes to the Mississippi River, unless now Mr. Goltra has found the secret of success, the Mississippi River with its $150,000,000, the Missouri River with its $22,000,000, and the Tennessee with its $12,000,000, and this appropriation of over $12,000,000 just adopted, with past expenditures, for the Cumberland, no commerce is on all these streams, because they are entirely different propositions, small-depth boats and under different conditions. And that is what I have been discussing here in exposing the waste on rivers and canals.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill, in my judgment, with the 70 new projects added, is much worse than the bill two years ago, when many gentlemen present voted against it. I can not understand why a man who voted against the bill at that time can come to any other conclusion at this time. Then we had 133 votes, not counting the pairs, against the bill. I say that the same condition that existed two years ago exists to-day. And in regard to that other proposition, you can not show any evidence thus far, so far as has been presented to us, even on the Black Warrior, which was to be the test, of any successful use of the rivers. I hope it will come. I believe in maintaining the rivers all the time, but not in putting in these very expensive projects and new expensive improvements until we can have some justification and some means of utilizing them. And that is what we have failed to do up to this time on all the rivers, except possibly the Monongahela and one or two other small projects.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ship channel connecting waters of the Great Lakes between Chicago, Duluth, and Buffalo, including St. Marys River, St. Clair River, channels in Lake St. Clair and Detroit River, Mich.: Completing improvement of Grosse Pointe Channel, Lake St. Clair, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 188, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, $94,000; for improvement of Livingstone Channel, Detroit River, in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 322, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, $750,000; in all, $844,000.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the arrangement Mr. Goltra has with the Shipping Board is this: At any time within six years he has the privilege of buying these barges and these steamers upon an appraisement to be made in such manner as the Government shall direct. Now, that is an exceedingly different proposition from any agreement to get these barges at one-half their value. He expects to pay for them their full value after that value has been ascertained in the manner I have indicated. The Government required Mr. Goltra, before making this lease to him, to expend $100,000 of his own money in acquiring wharfage rights at points they designated along the river. And he did it. And in addition to that, Mr. Goltra expended $35,000 of his own money in experiments made on the river and in developing this plan which is now approaching completion.

I never heard that any other responsible persons wanted to lease these barges. The whole scheme originated with Mr. Goltra. He submitted it to the engineers of this Government, and these barges and these steamers are being built now under their direction, and the steamers will be built in all probability by the Government itself. And in building the steamers they propose to use the machinery, the steam pipes, and the condensers which were purchased for use in our wooden ships—projects which have now been abandoned. And the intention is to salvage a large part of this valuable machinery and find this use for it.

I would like to know of the gentleman what other gentlemen, and I want him to name them, were willing to pay $100,000 out of their own pockets in acquiring wharfage space along these rivers, and I want to know who experimented other than Mr. Goltra with this proposition, expending $35,000 of his own money in developing this scheme, and I want to know what responsible persons made a better offer to the Government for these barges than the proposition made by Mr. Goltra, which has been accepted by the Government.

Mr. FREAR. Is that the question?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Col. Keller did not name the parties that were trying to get this lease; but he did say that there were a number of them, and the gentleman will find it in the hearings before the River and Harbor Committee. If the gentleman will permit me in rising in opposition to read from page 48, it is as follows:

Mr. SWITZER. You think this traffic will continue?

Mr. GOLTRA. Yes, sir; I have ideas about that matter that will interest you. At first you may disagree with me, but on reflection I think you will agree with me. The cost per ton per mile: If I can eventually purchase this fleet for $1,700,000 that has cost $3,360,000, that money will cost me 6 per cent per annum; that is, $283 a day. I know the number of men that are going on that boat to operate it—I am speaking now of one boat—and I know how much they will cost and how much they will eat; that will cost me just $36 a day.

Then he goes on to discuss the proposition. He said to me personally it is going to cost the Government twice as much to-day as it would take at any other time, because of the excessive high price of labor; and he said he expected to buy those boats at about half price. That is the statement he made in my office, and that is substantially the same statement that he made in his hearing. His statement differs substantially from the statement which the gentleman from Illinois has just made.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The gentleman is very clever. Everybody knows that it costs more to build now than it will 10 years from now or 6 years from now.

Mr. FREAR. That is Col. Goltra's statement.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. My statement is the fact, and Col. Goltra has never stated anything to the contrary. It is a contract that he has with the Government, providing that at any time within six years from the present time he has the right to buy these boats from the Government at an appraisement.

Mr. FREAR. Here is Col. Goltra's statement, that he expects to buy them at half price. Let me say that Col. Goltra had a trip on that river last year. An expert who is used to river traffic tells me that the Goltra boat will not be successful. He wasted the money and the time of the Government on the other trip. He wasted his own money. He took a dredge off the Mississippi so as to use it on some project, according to the Engineer's Report. He lost $10,000 on that trip. He says that the upper river to-day is in perfect condition, and that he can use it to-day. It does not need any improvement for his purposes. That is his own statement in the hearing. The water is there. Col. Goltra does not complain. So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me I have not made any unfair statement. I did not intend to do so. Unfortunately, the gentleman was not here.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. It is a clever statement, and it is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. FREAR. It is in accordance with the facts, and the gentleman does not know what the facts are.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I recited what the facts are.

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman is mistaken, and I have given them as they are.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. If we stay here, while the discussion we have just had has been interesting and valuable—and I have enjoyed hearing both gentlemen—if we stay here, I shall give notice now that I shall make a point of order on any gentleman discussing anything except the paragraphs of the bill from this on until the conclusion of the bill, if we are to be kept here. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. I think the intention of the gentleman is entirely justified, in view of the liberality of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mackinac, Cheboygan, Rogers City, Alpena, Harbor Beach, and Monroe Harbors, Saginaw, Black, Clinton, and Rouge Rivers, Mich.: Completing improvement of Alpena Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 830, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $67,500: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HICKS. I do so for the purpose of refuting a statement——

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, how much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HICKS. Only two minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to refute a statement made a few moments ago by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], my colleague from the second district, who intimated that the Republicans on this side of the House were not paying their share of attention to the consideration of this bill. At the time he made that statement, by actual count, there were 37 Republicans present and 29 Democrats.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Toledo, Port Clinton, Sandusky, Huron, Vermilion, Lorain, Cleveland, Fairport, Ashtabula, and Conneaut Harbors, Ohio: For maintenance, $55,000; completing improvement of Sandusky Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 982, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $181,000; completing improvement of Huron Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 5, Sixty-third Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $34,500: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement; completing improvement of Fairport Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 206, Sixty-third Congress, first session, $238,500; completing improvement of Ashtabula Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 997, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $83,000; in all, $592,000.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. SMALL: Page 21, line 26, after the word "improvement," insert "completing improvement of Lorain Harbor, $20,000," and on page 22, line 8, strike out the numerals "$592,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$612,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Chief of Engineers recommending this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

JANUARY 6, 1919.

Hon. JOHN H. SMALL,
Chairman Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SMALL: 1. The river and harbor act of August 8, 1917, adopted a project for the extension of the west breakwater at Lorain Harbor, in accordance with a report submitted in House Document No. 980, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and subject to conditions set forth in said document. The object of this improvement is to extend the west breakwater to the shore, so as to prevent shore erosion and consequent fill in the harbor area.

2. On account of the unfavorable conditions during the war, this work has not been undertaken, and the district engineer now states that to complete the work will require $20,000 in addition to the amount heretofore appropriated.

3. To do part of the work with the funds which are available and await further appropriation for the completion will materially increase the cost of the work, and as it is desirable that it be done as soon as practicable, it is recommended that the further appropriation of $20,000 be made for the completion of this improvement.

Very truly, yours,

W. M. BLACK,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.
By H. TAYLOR,
Brigadier General, United States Army.

The Clerk read as follows:

Colorado River, Ariz.: For maintenance for the Government levee on the Gila River near its junction with the Colorado River at Yuma, $10,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph. This is solely in the interest of the control of floods of the Arizona River, and has no reference to the improvement of navigation.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, this item was inserted because it was recommended in the Report of the Chief of Engineers and by the representative of the Chief of Engineers, Gen. Taylor, who was before us. It appears to be quite urgent. I am obliged to concede, if the gentleman insists on the point of order, that it is not for navigation, but for flood control.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I insist on it, although I have no objection to the merits of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

San Francisco, Oakland, Richmond, Monterey, and Humboldt Harbors, Redwood and Petaluma Creeks, Napa River, San Pablo Bay, Mare Island Strait, and Suisun Channel, Cal.: For maintenance, $124,800; for maintenance of Oakland Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1131, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $12,000; completing improvement of Suisun Channel in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 986, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $64,500; completing improvement of San Rafael Creek in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 801, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $27,300: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purpose of this improvement; completing improvement of Petaluma Creek in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 849, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, $20,000: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any land required for the purpose of this improvement; in all, $248,600.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 25, strike out the words "completing improvement of Petaluma Creek" and insert "for improvement of Napa River," and, in line 27, strike out "849, Sixty-fifth" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "795, Sixty-third."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to correct a clerical error in making up the bill. Petaluma Creek was substituted instead of Napa River. This does not change the appropriation, but carries out the intention of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

"Crescent City Harbor, Cal.: The condition in the item in the river and harbor act approved July 18, 1918, requiring assurances that a railroad shall be constructed between Crescent City, Cal., and Grants Pass, Oreg., is hereby waived until an appropriation is made by the United States for the further prosecution of said project."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I may explain the purpose of this amendment. When the project was adopted no appropriation was made, but a local contribution of $200,000 was made. There were other local conditions, primarily one to the effect that a certain railroad should be constructed, but recent conditions as to the scarcity and high cost of material as well as labor have made it impossible to construct the road. This simply waives the condition while they are spending their own money, so that the local conditions will not become applicable until after Congress makes an appropriation.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Puget Sound and its tributary waters, Olympia, Seattle, Anacortes, Port Gamble, Tacoma, and Bellingham Harbors, Lake Washington Ship Canal, Snohomish and Skagit Rivers, Swinomish Slough, waterway connecting Port Townsend Bay and Oak Bay, Columbia River between Wenatchee and Kettle Falls, Wash.: For maintenance, $27,000; for maintenance of east and west waterways, Seattle Harbor, in accordance with the report printed in Senate Document No. 313, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $40,000; completing improvement of Skagit River in accordance with the report printed in House Document No. 935, Sixty-third Congress, second session, $30,000; completing improvement of Anacortes Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1117, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $56,000; completing improvement of Port Gamble Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 851, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document, $12,000; in all, $165,000.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 25, line 19, by adding the following next after the semicolon, after the item of $40,000 in said line:

"For the maintenance of the Duwamish waterway, Seattle Harbor, to a depth of 20 feet and to a width of 150 feet at mean low water as far south as Eighth Avenue, south bridge, $40,000: Provided, That no part of said appropriation shall be available for said purpose until said improvements shall have been completed to project dimensions to said point."

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, after the many days of argument and discussion, I call your attention to an improvement in Seattle Harbor, covered by the amendment I have introduced for an appropriation of $40,000 for its maintenance. We have expended in Seattle by local interests over $6,000,000 on harbor improvements, and have never asked the United States Government for a single cent.

The bill carries an appropriation of $40,000 for the east waterway and the west waterway. Those are waterways dredged out by private interests 1,000 feet wide. The east waterway is a mile and a quarter long and the west waterway is a trifle over a mile long. Continuing this improvement along the Duwamish Valley project under the direction of the Army engineers, it is 500 feet wide, 150 feet between pierheads. This project has been completed by local interests at the expense of over $2,000,000. There are large shipbuilding enterprises on this river. The Seattle & North Pacific Shipbuilding Co., situated on this waterway, has contracts with the United States Government for the construction of ten 9,400-ton steamships.

In this project the Duwamish River, covered by the amendment, is 20 feet of water, 150 feet wide between pierheads and 500 feet wide between bulkheads. What we are after is an appropriation for the maintenance simply of this enterprise. Not one dollar are we asking for the building or construction of the enterprise, but simply its maintenance. It could not be included in this bill, because at that time this project was not completed. Technically it is not completed now. My amendment says that none of this appropriation shall be available until this improvement is completed to its project dimensions. In my city of Seattle on the east and west waterways there have been constructed one-seventh of all of the tonnage constructed by the Emergency Fleet Corporation. Over 20,000 men are in the shipyards on the east and west waterways and on this Duwamish River, and nearly 25,000 at the present time in the entire city. Since the Shipping Board or the Fleet Corporation has released private shipyards, so that they can enter into foreign contracts, this improvement will be alive with shipbuilding enterprises, and I am simply asking that in order that this may be maintained to a depth of 20 feet, in order to permit these shipbuilders to launch their ships and put them down this waterway, an appropriation be granted.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, how much does the amendment call for for maintenance?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Forty thousand dollars.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Where does the gentleman get that figure? Why do you say $40,000?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. It is the sum approved by the project and district engineers.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The United States engineers?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Yes; in Senate Document 313.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. They recommend it?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. They do recommend it. That is all I have to say.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman moves this amendment appropriating $40,000 for the maintenance of the Duwamish River. The city of Seattle is entitled to high praise for its civic enterprise in the improvement of the Duwamish River and the east and west waterways; but, as a matter of fact, the Chief of Engineers has only recommended the United States taking over the maintenance of the east and west waterways.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. That is correct.

Mr. SMALL. And we have provided for maintenance of the east and west waterways in the paragraph under consideration. However advisable it may be, we are not in a position, and the Committee of the Whole is not in a position, to bring it to the House nor could we consent that the House shall make an appropriation for the maintenance of this project for which no recommendation has been made.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Except by the district engineer and the project engineer.

Mr. SMALL. Yes. I am referring to the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Was the Chief of Engineers asked about this after he got that original estimate under direction of the War Department to confine his estimates to such projects as were absolutely necessary in the conduct of the war?

Mr. SMALL. The report to which the gentleman from Washington refers is based upon a resolution by the Senate, referring the matter, and in that report the Chief of Engineers uses this language:

> The board believes it is advisable for the United States to take over and assume the maintenance of those portions of the east and west waterways for a distance of 6,500 feet and 5,200 feet, respectively, from the pierhead line in Elliott Bay, at an estimated cost of $40,000.

That is the only recommendation that we have included in the bill. I will say to the gentleman our committee would be glad to pass a resolution, if it seems appropriate, referring this matter to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors in order to make further investigation and determine whether the United States should assume the maintenance of the Duwamish waterway.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. When was that dated?

Mr. SMALL. This is a quite recent report, dated July 9, 1918.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What does the chief say about that?

Mr. SMALL. I have just read.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I thought the gentleman read from the report of the board.

Mr. SMALL. No; I read the Chief of Engineer's report and the conclusions, and it makes no recommendation as to the Duwamish River.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The board makes no recommendation?

Mr. SMALL. No.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The Board of Engineers?

Mr. SMALL. I can tell you in a moment.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Pardon me, but the board recommends it.

Mr. SMALL. I will read you from the concluding paragraph from the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors:

> The board therefore recommends that the United States take over and assume the maintenance of the east and west waterways for distances of 6,500 feet and 5,200 feet, respectively, from the pierhead line at Elliott Bay at an annual estimated cost of $40,000.

The Chief of Engineers substantially adopts the same language, so the gentleman will see it will be a violation of a settled policy of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors as to what they shall recommend on a river and harbor bill, and gentlemen of the Committee of the Whole will see what a dangerous precedent would be set if the committee should adopt this amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. If the gentleman will yield for another question, has the survey been made of this Duwamish waterway?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; this report covers that. The resolution of the Senate says:

> To review the report on the survey of the east and west waterways and the Duwamish waterway at Seattle, Wash., printed in House Document No. 54, first session, Sixty-fifth Congress, and to submit such further report and recommendation upon said waterways, or any of them, as may be desirable in view of any change in local condition since the date of its prior report.

So they had full opportunity to recommend the maintenance of the Duwamish River by the United States if they desired to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SMALL. Can not the gentleman get along with less time than that—say two minutes?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. I will try. The report of the project engineer is dated the 31st of last May. The report of the Chief of Engineers is the 9th of July, I believe. Events move swiftly out in that country. That contract for ten 9,400-ton steamships was let near that interval. All of these shipyards along here [illustrating] have multiplied a thousandfold since the report of the local engineer on this project. As I said, events move swiftly out there. All of these great shipyards in here—in there [indicating]—is an improvement where the city has spent $2,850,000 on terminals, a port commission project involving the very latest mechanics and appliances capable of being utilized in the handling of cargoes. This project here is a part of the industrial improvements of Seattle, and I am simply asking that we have this in order to keep this channel open if necessary, not a dollar to be expended until the improvement is completed according to the project dimensions and under the direction of the United States Board of Engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SMALL) there were—ayes 32, noes 31.

Mr. SMALL. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman demands tellers. Those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. Twelve gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Honolulu, Kahului, Hilo, and Nawiliwili Harbors, Hawaii: For maintenance, $10,000; completing improvement of Kahului Harbor, $94,300; for improvement of Nawiliwili Harbor in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 609, Sixty-second Congress, second session, $250,000: Provided, That work on the project herein adopted shall not be commenced until the Secretary of War is satisfied that railroad connections will be made within a reasonable time which will make the harbor of Nawiliwili accessible by land to the entire southern portion of the island: Provided further, That the rates on said railroad shall be subject to regulation by the Secretary of War: And provided further, That no contract for work herein appropriated for shall be entered into until the county of Kauai, or other agency, shall have deposited to the credit of the Secretary of War, in some bank in the Territory of Hawaii to be designated by him, the sum of $200,000, which sum shall be expended by the Secretary of War in the further prosecution of said work, in the same manner and in equal amounts as the sum herein appropriated: And provided further, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for acquiring any lands required for the purposes of this improvement; in all, $354,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman let this committee amendment be adopted, simply correcting——

Mr. MANN. No; I can not allow the committee amendment to go in; I would otherwise.

This proposition, which is quite agreeable to me, provides that the rates on a railroad to be provided for shall be subject to regulation by the Secretary of War. And I have no doubt that that might be a good thing. But the interstate-commerce law provides, or I am under the impression at least that it does, that the rates on railroads in Hawaii, as well as elsewhere in the United States, shall be subject to control by the Interstate Commerce Commission. And I doubt very much the desirability of attempting to repeal the interstate-commerce law by a little sentence in the river and harbor bill.

The Secretary of War, through the district engineer, might be able to regulate rates on a railroad, though of course they have no special knowledge on the subject, but the interstate-commerce law makes a lot of provisions in reference to rates and notices, the posting of rates and the filing of tariffs, and everything of that kind. And while that law is largely in abeyance at present, it is not repealed, and I see no reason, unless the gentleman from North Carolina can give me one, why it should be repealed in part or in whole at this time.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the question was as to where this improvement should be located——

Mr. MANN. I am not saying anything about the improvement or the requirement for the construction of a railroad. I am in favor of the improvement. I do not know, but I think I heard a good deal about this on a trip I made to Hawaii with others at one time, though I do not recollect definitely about it. I have no objection to the improvement. I think it is a deserving one. I think it is perfectly proper, as well as desirable, to require a railroad to be in some way regulated. But has the gentleman any special information as to whether the Interstate Commerce Commission should not still retain jurisdiction over all these railroads out there?

Mr. SMALL. Except it is the usual policy of Congress in imposing any condition, when improvements are authorized, to leave it to the War Department to look after the performance of those conditions.

Mr. MANN. That is not one of the conditions. One of the conditions is the construction of the railroad. That is all right to leave to the Secretary of War. Now, when the railroad is constructed, does the gentleman mean to say then we should remove all the restrictions now contained in the interstate commerce law? Would not this change those? Here is a requirement in the law in regard to the time when they can make changes——

Mr. SMALL. May I interrupt the gentleman? Is it the opinion of the gentleman as to the railroad connections that the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon complaint, would have the power to regulate and fix the rates there?

Mr. MANN. That was my understanding. In addition to that, however, I had a gentleman telephone to the Interstate Commerce Commission to-day, and was informed by the assistant secretary that the Interstate Commerce Commission had jurisdiction over railroads in Hawaii. I was under that impression, because I had charge of the interstate-commerce bill when it passed the House.

Mr. SMALL. I may say that this particular condition was recommended in the report by the Chief of Engineers, and it seemed wise to the committee that there should be some regulation of the rates there.

Mr. MANN. We all agree to that.

Mr. SMALL. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words beginning on line 14 this language:

Provided further, That the rates on said railroad shall be subject to regulation by the Secretary of War.

The last "And provided further" should go out, so that the words struck out shall begin with "That the rates on said railroad shall be subject to regulation by the Secretary of War: And provided further."

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. "Provided further" should remain in there.

Mr. SMALL. "Provided further" should remain in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMALL: Page 26, line 24, after the word "further," strike out "That the rates on said railroad shall be subject to regulation by the Secretary of War: And provided further."

Mr. SMALL. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMALL. I have another amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMALL: Page 26, line 26, strike out "$354,000," at the end of the line, and insert in lieu thereof "$354,300."

Mr. SMALL. This only corrects a clerical error in the aggregate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

San Juan Harbor, Porto Rico: For maintenance, $10,000.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think I ought to make a comment at this time. The Committee of the Whole has just adopted an amendment assuming an obligation on the part of the United States for maintenance of the Duwamish waterway, when there has been no recommendation and no official information before the committee. The gentleman who presented the amendment, Mr. MILLER of Washington, came before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and urged the maintenance of the east and west waterways, carrying an appropriation of $40,000, which met with the approval of the committee and is contained in the bill.

I think I ought to absolve the Committee on Rivers and Harbors from having made this error, and to point out to the Committee of the Whole how dangerous it is to make a precedent of this kind. As to whether I shall ask for a separate vote upon this amendment will depend upon the consensus of opinion among the members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Boston Harbor, Mass., with a view to the construction of an entrance channel through South Beach, between Winthrop and Revere, connecting Broad Sound with the Charlestown Navy Yard by way of Chelsea River; also with a view to the construction of a connecting ship channel from the proposed new entrance at South Beach to South Boston.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMALL: Page 28, line 25, strike out the word "South" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Short," and on page 29, line 2, strike out the word "South" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Short."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, this is simply to correct a clerical error.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Intracoastal waterway from Beaufort, N. C., to the Cape Fear River.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. SMALL: Page 30, between lines 7 and 8, insert the following paragraph:
"Waccamaw River, N. C. and S. C."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sabine Lake and Sabine Pass, La. and Tex., with a view to the construction of a dam in the outlet of Sabine Lake, including consideration of any proposition for cooperation on the part of local interests.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Tonawanda Harbor and Tonawanda Creek, N. Y.; Lake Tahoe, Cal. and Nev."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Honolulu Harbor, Hawaii.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WELTY: Page 31, line 14, after the word "Hawaii," insert "to resurvey the Miami & Erie Canal and report as to the feasibility and advisability of improving the same to a depth of 12 feet, with a prism of 100 feet, and to report with detailed plans and an estimate of the cost of such improvement."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think a point of order should be made at this time, when three or four million dollars have been voted for canals in other places. In 1894 the Congress passed a resolution providing for a survey of the canal or waterway connecting the Ohio and the Lakes. In pursuance of that resolution the Board of Engineers made three different surveys of the three canals in Ohio. They recommended one that is mentioned here in this amendment as feasible and proper in order to connect the Ohio with the Great Lakes from Cincinnati to Toledo. The resolution provided that it shall be only 7 feet deep. They made a survey of 10 feet. Nothing was done because no improvements had been made in the Ohio River. Since that time almost $50,000,000 has been expended in the improvement of the Ohio River and over $150,000,000 on the Erie Canal, and now it seems that there ought to be a connecting link between the Mississippi River and the Lakes. I ask simply for a resurvey to a depth of 12 feet to be in harmony with the improvements on the Erie Canal. I know the point of order must be sustained if the gentleman from Wisconsin will insist, but I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order in view of the fact that millions of dollars have been spent on other canals under the direction of this committee and permit the House to pass upon the merits of the proposed survey.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I believe this project is no more worthy than others carried in the bill, but I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, having been granted permission to extend my remarks, I beg to submit the following, which I believe, had it been fully known by the House, the Members present would have permitted the proposed amendment, even in the face of the rule not to allow any amendments on the floor of the House not fully considered by the committee.

On April 20, 1918, I filed a bill (H. R. 11579) "To authorize the appointment of a board of engineers to make a preliminary location, survey, and plans for a canal connecting the waters of Lake Erie and the Ohio River on the line of the Miami & Erie Canal from Toledo to Cincinnati, Ohio, and from a point near Defiance, Ohio, to a point in the southerly end of Lake Michigan, and to estimate the cost thereof." This bill was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, because that committee, under the rules of the House, is the only one having jurisdiction of canals.

Full hearings were had on said bill by the committee, and on December 19, 1918, the committee having considered the same, reported it to the House with the recommendation that it pass with certain amendments, which report and amended bill were ordered to be printed for the consideration of this House.

I offered this amendment to the rivers and and harbors bill for the reason that I was of the opinion that, because of the congestion of the calendars in both branches of Congress, my bill could not be considered during the short session, and with a hope that a resurvey could be commenced with the opening of spring. I believe that had the membership of the House fully known the facts, the vote would have been different, even though it was late at night when I was permitted to offer my amendment.

I believe that the country should know that Congress is definitely planning in the development of the inland waterways, and for this reason I propose to again offer this amendment when the Commerce Committee considers this bill, with a hope that if the Senate adopts the same the House will then be inclined to accept this amendment. The amendment was lost by only 10 votes, with the solid opposition of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, which to me is sufficient evidence that there are others in the House sharing my views in matters of building up our inland commerce with a view of taking care of the products of the Mississippi Valley and relieving the congestion of transportation.

My bill, in short, provides for the appointment, by the Secretary of War of a board of three engineers skilled in the survey of navigable waterways, to make a preliminary examination, location, survey, and detailed plans for a canal, and an estimated cost thereof, and to make a survey and also to estimate the cost thereof for a canal from the Miami & Erie Canal, near Defiance, Ohio, to the southerly end of Lake Michigan. The bill further provides that the canal should be of a depth not less than 12 nor more than 16 feet, and of sufficient width to permit the passage of vessels as are contemplated to be used on the Erie Canal. Section 3 of this bill provides for an estimate of the costs of the canal, including the cost of dams, reservoirs, locks, surveys, and other matters necessary to its location, construction, operation, and maintenance, water supply, and the probable water power. Section 4 provides that in estimating the cost of such canal the board shall exclude all property whatsoever now owned and controlled by any State or States or political subdivisions, through which the canal may pass. Section 5 provides for the necessary employees to carry out the provisions of this act, and their pay, while section 6 provides for reports.

There is no need of canalizing our rivers and of building these canals unless the Government intends to complete inland navigation, so that barges on our lakes and rivers can go from New Orleans to New York and return without unloading their cargoes. I believe that this Congress should go on record speedily, showing its intention to make these improvements, so that business can adjust itself with that end in view.

Our sphere of influence is no more confined to the geography of our own country. We have finally reached our majority, so to speak, and have become a world commercial power. Our farms and factories produce more than we are able to consume, and they must seek foreign markets for their supplies. If this is true, transportation will of necessity become a mighty factor. We can not locate all of these farms and factories along the seaboard, and in order to give them a chance we must give them cheaper transportation. Their products must be loaded on ocean-going vessels at the least possible expense, to be taken into foreign markets and sold in competition with the products of the world. The time has come when we must quit dreaming and write these visions into law, so as to furnish a chart to the business and manufacturing interests of our country, in order that they will know that it will be only a matter of time until barges will go to New York or New Orleans, and will only be unloaded when they are loaded into ships bound for foreign markets.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, permit me only to point out a few facts that are indicative, showing that it will be only a matter of a few years until we will be the foremost commercial power in the world.

First. Congress realized in 1913 that the expansion of our foreign trade would never be aggressive and become a power unless we are permitted to transact all of our business through American banks. In that year Congress passed what is known as the Federal reserve banking act, one section of which provides for taking care of the foreign trade by inaugurating a foreign banking system. Since the passage of said act this country has established in foreign countries 113 banks and agencies, all of which are under Federal control.

Second. In April, 1918, Congress passed an act to promote export trade, which permitted combinations for the purpose of establishing a common sales agency in taking care of our surplus products.

Third. The Committee on Appropriations of the present Congress recommended that $525,000 be spent for procuring information about foreign trade and stimulating the same.

In addition to these we are bending every effort to build up a merchant marine, so that our products can be transported into foreign markets in ships built and owned by Americans.

Besides this let me mention only a few facts, which will inevitably mean the completion of the canal to connect the Ohio River with the Lakes.

On August 17, 1894, Congress passed an act by which the Secretary of War was "authorized and directed to appoint a board of three engineers of the Army, whose duty it shall be to survey the Miami & Erie Canal, the Ohio Canal, and such branches thereof and such river and stream channels as may in their judgment form available portions of a continuous canal connecting the waters of Lake Erie with the Ohio River, through the State of Ohio, and to report the feasibility and advisibility of improving and widening such canal to 70 feet at the water line and deepening the same to 7 feet." This report was submitted to Congress on the 27th day of February, 1896, by the Secretary of War, and stated that:

It would be feasible to construct a canal of the dimensions specified in the act upon any of the three routes described, but a canal of the dimensions and capacity specified by Congress would by inadequate depth in the canal and in the Ohio, requiring a transshipment of freight, be so restricted in its benefits to interstate commerce that the construction of a canal of such dimensions or apart from an adequate improvement of the Ohio River would not, in the opinion of the board, be advisable.

The report also stated that:

The board has not considered it a part of its duty to present any recommendations with regard to a canal of dimensions different from those prescribed in the act of Congress, but it calls attention to the fact that the report of the executive officer of the board covers the question of water supply and cost of construction for a canal having a uniform width of 85 feet and depth of 10 feet, which would admit the passage of vessels that might be considered of about the least practicable size for lake navigation.

In this report the engineers submitted minute details in favor of the western route from Cincinnati to Toledo along the old Miami & Erie Canal because of "its superior water supply, its important terminal points, and the magnitude of its local traffic." In the report they further say:

A consideration of importance in favor of this route arises from its relation to the old Wabash and Erie route, and particularly to the project advanced many years ago, and lately being brought forward again, to connect the west end of Lake Erie with the southern end of Lake Michigan.

Among the direct benefits, the report mentioned the following:

If the inquiry is to be strictly limited to a canal of the dimensions of the present Erie Canal of New York, and without reference to any improvement in the navigable condition of the Ohio River, the question of advisability can be answered in the negative. Such a canal would be restricted to a purely local rôle, and while it might be a proper object of State or private enterprise, it would not be so on the part of the General Government. But the question will be examined on the basis of the broader assumptions already made.

The engineers point out other benefits to the Nation in the event the Erie Canal is completed and the Ohio River connected with the Lakes by a canal which will permit barges to pass over this route without unloading their cargoes.

Among the indirect benefits in said report we find the following:

As is well known, what may be called the indirect benefits of water competition in freight traffic are generally considered as of greater importance than the direct benefits. It is fully recognized that the influence of a capacious and free waterway in controlling and equalizing railroad freight rates, even if only a small proportion of freight actually goes by water, is of great value to the public. The history of the Erie Canal shows, by a comparison of summer and winter rates on lines paralleling it, that it has effected a reduction in railroad freight during the past 25 years of not less than 50 per cent; and it has been estimated that the amount saved in transportation of grain alone through the State of New York by the Erie Canal during the last 30 years is at least $200,000,000. The influence of the waterway does not cease with the suspension of navigation in the autumn. On all such freight as can be held over until spring the railroads are compelled to make concessions even in wintertime. It is a recognized fact among the best railroad authorities that free water competition, instead of being a detriment to the railroads, is a benefit to them. The classes of freight that can be carried most economically by water are those that are carried with least profit by the railroads. The two systems of transportation are natural complements of each other and make possible a division of traffic which is of advantage to both. That this argument rests on a sound basis is evidenced by the successful contemporaneous development of canals and railroads in France and by the fact that in our own country the most prosperous railroads are those that parallel the great waterways.

As to the future of existing canals, the Chief Engineer further states:

A matter of importance bearing upon the general subject arises from the impending fate of the present Ohio canals. It is highly improbable that the State of Ohio will much longer maintain a system which has been suffered to deteriorate until it has become a great public burden without any adequate return. If the State abandons its canals, and if the lines are occupied by railroads and the reservoir sites are sold, it will never again be possible to build a canal along any of the proposed routes.

Since the filing of this report the Federal Government has expended millions upon millions for the canalization of rivers and the building of canals. The Ohio River was then unimproved, but since that time almost $50,000,000 have been expended in the canalization of this stream. The State of New York has expended over one hundred and fifty millions in deepening and widening the old Erie Canal. Canada has proposed an enlargement of the Welland Canal so as to permit ocean-going vessels to unload at the docks of Chicago and Duluth, and the Federal Government is expending $6,290,000 for the building of barges to care for the commerce of the lower Mississippi and $3,336,000 for the building of barges for commerce between St. Louis and Minneapolis. This is in addition to the present fleet of 29 barges, each of 500-ton capacity, now on the lower Mississippi. These are acts of men of vision, and no man will gainsay that the system of inland water transportation will be completed until those now spending millions for barges on the Mississippi and the Erie Canal will be permitted to carry their cargoes between the Mississippi and its tributaries to the State of New York.

These barges for the Mississippi now under construction and for use on the upper river are 300 feet long and 48 feet wide and draw only 4 feet of water. They are propelled by steamers which are 265 feet long and have a beam of 58 feet and operate in 3½ feet of water. There are no similar tugs in use at the present time on any of the rivers. There are 19 barges and 3 steamers to be built for use on the upper Mississippi. These barges are to start from St. Louis loaded with coal and return from Minneapolis loaded with ore. One of these steamers can propel six of these great barges. Six of these steel barges propelled by one steamer can carry more ore in one trip by 3,600 tons than can be carried on one of the largest of the ore-carrying steamers on the Lakes. One of these steamers with its six barges will carry as much iron ore or coal as can be carried on three hundred 50-foot freight cars and will move down the river as fast as any freight train can move. In other words, one of these steamers will bring down the river at one load the equivalent of seven long trainloads of ore.

The North and Northwest are calling for coal, and it is estimated that these barges could carry this coal for 90 cents to $1 per ton cheaper than the railroads. What the saving would be is only conjectural, but when you consider the consummation of coal in the homes, to say nothing of our factories, it will be worth while to think about these matters. In addition to these benefits, the farmers and manufacturers will receive the benefits of cheaper transportation of their products to New York or New Orleans. I know there are those who are skeptical in the matter of this proposed improvement. I know there are those who consider its advocates dreamers, but to these I need only say that those who advocated the Panama Canal were considered dreamers at first, yet the products of the farms and factories of the State of Washington can be transported through this canal to New York for less than the cost of transportation from New York to Ohio, and no one will now advocate the abandoning of the Panama Canal.

All of these matters go to show that we have not only fought and won the world war, but that American commerce will be carried into every country of the globe, and instead of buying goods stamped "Made in Germany" or "Made in Japan" the familiar sign "Made in America" will be found. Commerce is the life of a nation, and I hope that the Nation will continue to have men at its head who are able to appreciate the sacrifice made by our soldiers and preserve this Republic by granting it more life.

The canals in Ohio cost the Federal and State Governments almost $16,000,000, and yet this property has been permitted to go into disuse because of the neglect of its officers. Would we treat this property thus if it was our private property? Bankruptcy would soon stare us in the face. Then, why should we longer neglect this public property? Is a public office no longer a public trust? Are men elected to the position of these trusts for what they can get out of it? Shall we sit supinely here and fail in our duties, and then have our conscience condemn us the remainder of our lives because we failed to do our full duty? But, gentlemen, we must not forget that we can not deal with ourselves alone while here, but must answer sooner or later to a constituency, having a right to judge us by our acts of commission as well as omission.

These canals, in the first place, were built largely from the sale of Government lands, but the grant carried a proviso that "the said canals, when completed or used, shall be, and forever remain, public highways for the use of the Government of the United States, free from any toll or charge whatever for any property in the United States, or persons in their service passing along the same." These canals in Ohio have been in disuse for more than a quarter of a century. The survey was made under an act of Congress over 22 years ago, and yet the Federal Government has been acting the part of Rip Van Winkle ever since that time. Is it not time that they should go on record in the matter of the canals of Ohio and relieve their right and title to the land, or develop them for what they are intended? These lands should either be used for agricultural purposes, and permit the farmers to raise corn and potatoes, or they should be properly utilized by the people in the matter of transportation of the products of these farms and the thriving factories along these routes.

I am only asking for a survey and a report as to the feasibility and advisability of such a proposed canal, and I hope that Congress will vote favorably upon the proposed amendment so as to be in a position to pass more intelligently on this matter.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard. This was not presented to the committee. It involves a very important and expensive survey. There are other considerations that ought to have been presented to the committee, and I do not think the Committee of the Whole at this time, when no opportunity has been had by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to consider it, should give favorable consideration to the adoption of this provision for making this important survey at this time.

Mr. WELTY. In response to what the gentleman says, I would say that the engineers——

Mr. SMALL. And let me say further that the language is informal, and, I think, is incorrect.

Mr. WELTY. If it is informal I want to say that I copied the language from the act of 1894, and it simply provides for a resurvey of that which had been surveyed and reported two years afterwards, in 1896.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMALL) there were—ayes 17, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That no part of the funds herein or hereafter appropriated for works of river and harbor improvement shall be used to pay for any work done by private contract if the contract price is more than 25 per cent in excess of the estimated cost of doing the work by Government plant: Provided, That in estimating the cost of doing the work by Government plant, including the cost of labor and materials, there shall also be taken into account proper charges for depreciation of plant and all supervising and overhead expenses and interest on the capital invested in the Government plant, but the rate of interest shall not exceed the maximum prevailing rate being paid by the United States on current issues of bonds or other evidences of indebtedness.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment by Mr. SMALL: Add the following new section at the end of the bill:

"SEC. 5. That Little River, from Big Lake, in Mississippi County, to Marked Tree, in Poinsett County, Ark., is hereby declared to be not a navigable waterway of the United States within the meaning of the laws enacted by Congress for the protection of such waterways: Provided, That this provision shall be null and void unless expressly approved by an act of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas within two years from the date of approval of this act."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has no jurisdiction of this matter.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make this statement: The purport of the amendment is plain upon its face. It is to declare a certain stream within certain limits in the State of Arkansas not navigable within the meaning of the laws of the United States if it shall be approved within two years by the Legislature of the State of Arkansas. I will state that the matter has been considered by the committee, was referred to the Chief of Engineers, and I have before me a letter from the Chief of Engineers recommending it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that those matters ought to go always to the committee that has jurisdiction over them, which committee considers all of these propositions. The gentleman endeavors to insert it upon a river and harbor bill. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has these bills come before them. Why should they not have this matter go before them? There is no difficulty in getting consideration of bills of this kind by the proper committee.

Mr. SMALL. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has been assuming jurisdiction of such matters.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; the Committee on Rivers and Harbors had sometimes offered an amendment like this, but the Rivers and Harbors Committee does not have jurisdiction of such bills. A great many such bills have been in Congress since I have been here, and I have never known them to go anywhere except to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Sometimes, as a matter of river and harbor improvement, the Rivers and Harbors Committee has included an item in the bill, but this has nothing to do with river and harbor improvement. It is entirely foreign to this bill. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has no jurisdiction of the subject matter, and this has no place on this bill. It is not a part of river and harbor improvement. Doubtless some one, I do not know who, desires to have this legislation; but the mere fact that some very good Member of the House desires legislation is no reason why it should be enacted unless proper methods are pursued. I make the point of order.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to argue the point of order, and yet I do not wish to do so at this time. I will ask the gentleman to withdraw his point of order in order that I may withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman desires to withdraw his amendment, he can do it without my withdrawing the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that I can not concede that the position of the gentleman from Illinois is well taken, that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has no jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not need to concede it, because it is so well settled that it does not make any difference what the gentleman concedes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the several amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13462, the river and harbor appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] appropriating $40,000 for the maintenance of the Duwamish River.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments, except the Miller amendment.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the Miller amendment.

The question was taken.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 42.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will not make such a demand on Monday.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I understand it, the gentleman simply desires to have the vote on Monday instead of to-night?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, then under the circumstances we will have to adjourn.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS

By unanimous consent, Mr. SWITZER was granted leave to withdrawn from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Robert H. Lawson, H. R. 19709, Sixty-third Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of absence for five weeks on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, January 13, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SALVAGE OF SHIPPING.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have a communication from the Twentieth Century Deep-Sea Salvage Syndicate, of Chicago, Ill., which I ask may be read.

There being no objection, the communication was read, as follows:

TWENTIETH CENTURY DEEP-SEA SALVAGE SYNDICATE,
Chicago, January 6, 1919.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Commerce Committee, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have the honor to call to your attention, as we were recommended to do by Mr. H. H. Garven, foreign trade commissioner of the Chicago Chamber of Commerce, a matter of the gravest importance, we think, with respect to the available shipping of the United States and her allies, viz: The open boast of Germany, through Councilor von Stockert, of the German Navy Department, that the reports of submarine sinkings comprise a record of shipping which gives Germany an advantage in salvaging operations.

By reason of equipment which enables us to go to greater depths than divers, and at those depths attach buoyancy chambers to ships to float them, our syndicate is concerned in the salvaging of shipping from the high seas. Our American syndicate meets at once the fact that Germany has the exact locations of hundreds of valuable cargoes of which we and other American salvaging interests have no information. Our situation is similar to that of British and other salvors.

The question which should be pressed home to the peace conferees was stated in a cable message we sent to President Wilson, as follows:

"Deep-Sea Salvage Syndicate here, comprising former Lithuanians, respectfully inquire whether, among peace terms, Germany will be required to surrender data in exclusive possession where shipping was sunk by submarines. We urge importance."

It is our hope and the expectation of our advisors in the Chicago Association of Commerce that you will bring this matter up for the consideration of your committee, and also bring it up on the floor of the Senate with the purpose of publicly demanding the surrender by Germany of the record of her crimes without which surrender German salvaging interests expect to press an advantage over the United States and her associates in the war.

Will you permit such advantages to be overlooked? As stated above, Secretary Redfield advises us that he knows of no present plans to get the information contained in the reports of submarine crews. Will you please advise us what can be done?

Respectfully, yours, CLYDE S. THOMAS.

BRITISH SHIPPING (S. DOC. NO. 335).

Mr. FLETCHER. I have here a very interesting article on the subject of the problem of British shipping, by Sydney Brooks, published in the Nineteenth Century for December. It discusses the whole question of British shipping, which necessarily involves the shipping of other countries and world shipping. It is a very able discussion of the subject, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed as a public document. I have complied with the law and submit an estimate of the cost with this application.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SOLDIERS' MAIL.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I present to the Senate a letter written by Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, inclosing a communication from Gen. Goethals and also a cablegram from Gen. Pershing relative to the transportation and delivery of mail to and from the Expeditionary Forces in France. I ask that the letter and accompanying papers be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 9, 1919.

Hon. JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR SHAFROTH: Some days ago you called my attention to comments which were current with regard to irregularity in the mail service between the United States and the soldiers of the American Expeditionary Forces, and I told you I was then having an examination made into the matter and would be glad to place the results of the examination in your hands. I now have pleasure in handing you a cablegram from Gen. Harbord, commanding general of the services of supply in France, and a report from Maj. Gen. Goethals covering the collection and dispatch of mail in the United States intended for our Expeditionary Forces abroad. Neither of these reports undertakes to examine into individual complaints with regard to delayed or irregular mail service. Both are in response to a direction from me that a summary examination of the entire situation should be made on the two sides of the ocean. They therefore deal with the volume of mail matter and the speed with which it is handled.

It is, of course, entirely obvious that there is no question of divided responsibility in this matter. The War Department and the Army undertake the distribution and collection of mail in France. The Post Office Department delivers the mail to us here in New York and receives it from us at the ports of embarkation in France; its services are helpful and expeditious, and whatever delays there are grow out of the essential situation in France as described in Gen. Harbord's cablegram. I am particularly anxious to have it understood, therefore, that the Post Office Department is helpful and that the War Department does not feel that any difficulties are attributable to the postal service operated by that department.

I do not think it would be helpful to restate in altered phrase the difficulties pointed out by Gen. Harbord. They are, however, very real, and the difference between the situation of an army in actual conflict in a disturbed area and in a country the transportation facilities of which are taxed to the utmost, and such a service operated in a settled country like our own, is very great. The change of location and designation of units, the shifting of personnel, the necessary secrecy of military movements, inadequate transportation facilities, absorption of attention upon military operations are all elements which must be taken into account, while, as is pointed out in the report of Gen. Goethals, obscure and inadequate addressing and the usual difficulties of mail dispatch here apply with equal force to mail intended for our overseas troops.

I have been, of course, constantly in contact with this situation. I studied it on the occasion of my first trip to Europe, in March, 1918, and as a result of that trip worked out with the Postmaster General the arrangement whereby the entire responsibility for the service in France passed from the Post Office Department to the Army. I later restudied the question in September, 1918, when the new Army system was fairly well organized and constantly improving. Now that the armistice has brought about the suspension of hostilities, undoubtedly the improvement will be even more marked and rapid, except as further elements of difficulty are introduced by the presence of a substantial part of the American Army on German soil, into which railroad and other transportation facilities are extremely limited, and by the return of soldiers to the United States, which will add to the movement of the troops as they progress from the interior of France to the seaboard and are embarked for their journey home.

I have not attempted to deal with individual instances which have come to your attention or to mine. There are very many of them; some of them seem quite impossible of explanation. Many of them, upon narrow inquiry, turn out to be mistakes for which the system installed is in no way responsible; some of them undoubtedly are due to failures on the part of employees promptly and efficiently to perform their duties; but the system is under constant supervision and its employees are becoming daily better trained, and the improvement will be manifest.

In the meantime, it is only just to Gen. Pershing and Gen. Harbord and Gen. March and Gen. Goethals to say that each of them has appreciated profoundly the importance of regularity in the mail, both as a matter of justice to the soldier and his family and as a matter of efficiency in the Army, and all of these officers have given the matter constant attention, with a view to overcoming the difficulties and improving the service.

Cordially, yours, NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

JANUARY 6, 1919.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

Subject: Examination of mail destined for the American Expeditionary Forces.

1. In accordance with your instructions of December 28, 1918, the commanding general port of embarkation, Hoboken, N. J., was directed to make the check of mail destined for the American Expeditionary Forces, and his examination of first and second class mail covered a period of one week—from December 27, 1918, to January 2, 1919, both dates inclusive. During this period, 1,552 sacks of first-class mail and 10,474 sacks of second-class mail were received from the terminal and dispatched to the American Expeditionary Forces. From these sacks there were examined 788 letters and 715 prints, which had been sent from all parts of the United States. The bundles from which the mail was taken were prepared for delivery to the ship's side within three hours of call from the officer in charge of the dispatch of mail at Hoboken.

2. The following is a summary of the number of days required for the transmission of mails from time of postmark in several sections of the country to time of delivery by post-office authorities to the Army authorities at Hoboken.

	First-class mail.		Second-class mail.
	Average days.	Longest time.	Average days.	Longest time.
Pacific coast	6½	13	8	12
Montana to Texas	5	7	6½	10
West of Mississippi and Southern States	3¾	6	6½	11
Chicago, Ohio, and West Pennsylvania	1¾	13	3½	6
Balance of eastern States	1¼	3	2½	4

3. From the time of mailing to the time of delivery to the military authorities at Hoboken all mail is in the hands of the Post Office Department. All classes which are marked for the American Expeditionary Forces are shipped by the Post Office Department to the Chelsea Terminal, which occupies the entire second floor of Pier 86, North River. At this point it is sorted and marked for the various organizations in France for which intended, and is delivered by the Post Office Department to the military authorities when called for for loading on steamers. The time that the mail is in the hands of the military authorities at Hoboken until the departure of the steamer varies from one to three days, except in the unusual cases where sailings may be delayed on account of unforeseen circumstances, as, for instance, an accident may happen to a ship to defer sailing, or in some cases it is necessary to transfer mail from a ship on which it has already been loaded. A close liaison has been established between the postal office at Chelsea Terminal and the officer in charge of the mail at Hoboken, in order to eliminate delays in the delivery of mail to ship's side. Mail is loaded on the ship as soon as it is received from the Post Office Department.

4. It will be noted that the week during which this examination of mail was made was during the holiday season and followed the season of the year when the mail service over the whole country is taxed with unusual quantities of mail. Notwithstanding this condition, the average time required for deliveries would not, in any case, appear excessive, and the maximum time consumed is believed to be due entirely to the heavy holiday conditions.

5. From information obtained at Hoboken, it is believed that one great cause of delay in the delivery of mail to the American Expeditionary Forces has been due to the change in designations of organizations after arriving in France, and in a great many individual cases in the transfer of individuals from one organization to another. As mail is made up in the Chelsea Terminal in accordance with the designations of organizations as addressed, and as reports of changes in organizations are sometimes slow in reaching that terminal, delays which can not be corrected are bound to occur. As soon as changes in the designations are received the postal authorities make corrections as far as possible in the markings on their packages before they go overseas. Another cause of delay, both in the Chelsea Terminal and, no doubt, in the delivery of mail in France, is due to the illegibility of addresses, to straighten out which the services of a force of men are constantly necessary. Delay is also caused by the sending of casuals overseas and the time necessary to locate those men in definite organizations to which their mail may be forwarded. Detailed information on this subject is contained in report, inclosed herewith, of the officer in charge of mail at Hoboken, which sets out at greater length the result of examination made of the mail.

GEO. W. GOETHALS,
Major General, Assistant Chief of Staff, Director of Purchase, Storage and Traffic.

No. 2022. December 31. Confidential.

For the Chief of Staff.

Paragraph 1. Reference X377, following report is submitted: During the month of November there were received from the United States 66,614 sacks of mail in 15 shipments.

Subparagraph A. The average time for the transmission of this mail between the United States and base ports in France was 12 days; the average interval of time between shipments was two days; and the average time of unloading and shipping mails complete from base ports was three days. The time indicated as required for the handling of mail at base ports applies to all classes of mail and is figured from hour of arrival of ship until hour of departure of last sack of mail. All first-class mail, however, is cleared from base ports in 24 hours. During this period mail is unloaded, sacks are checked for accuracy of direction, and mail is transported to station and loaded on trains.

Subparagraph B. The average time for the carrying of mail between base ports and the headquarters, S. O. S. was two days; and between base ports and general headquarters was four days; and between base ports and Nancy, which is selected as typical point in the advance areas where scheduled rail service ceases, was five days.

Subparagraph C. At points in the advance areas and occupied territory beyond Nancy and similar rail heads, where there are no scheduled train movements and dependence must be made on irregular moving supply trains and trucks, no accurate statistics can be compiled, but the time of transmission may be estimated as from 2 to 10 days, varying with the weather and road conditions, amount of transportation available for movement of mails, and upon the movement and distance from rail heads of the units for whom mail is intended. All transmission of mail in France is delayed by the irregular train service resulting from war conditions, such as the constant shifting of large bodies of troops and deliveries of required supplies, by the limited number of cars for the transportation of mail that can be secured from the French railroad authorities, and by the fact that much mail must be shipped by freight schedule to obtain delivery.

Subparagraph D. During the month of November the time of transmission of outgoing mail from combat troops to points in the advance areas, where scheduled train movements began, was from 2 to 10 days, dependent upon conditions, as indicated in preceding paragraph. From these advance points, such as Nancy, to the port of debarkation, the average time of transmission was five days.

Subparagraph E. Pursuant to cablegram A–1331, paragraph 1, all mail from the American Expeditionary Forces intended for delivery to United States is turned over to the United States civil postal service at certain ports designated by them, after which responsibility of military postal service ends. During month of November 13,570 sacks of mail from members of the American Expeditionary Forces were delivered to civil postal authorities; and the latter reports this was forwarded to the United States in seven shipments, average time between shipments four days. For comparison, shipment of mail from American Expeditionary Forces to United States during the month of October was 10,917 sacks.

Subparagraph F. Pieces of mail handled in Army post offices during November total 90,467,929, estimated on basis of 40 letters to a package and 58 prints to a sack.

Subparagraph G. From Postal Express Service statistics for December, which are not complete, the following information is available: Received from United States, including Christmas packages, 123,981 sacks of mail. Aside from that forwarded by regular railway mail facilities, this bulk was dispatched to destinations in 174 separate car shipments, no car of which has been longer than eight days en route to destination. There has been delivered to the civil postal authorities for dispatch to United States from December 1 to December 24 19,896 sacks of mail, and the civil postal officials report that this was dispatched in nine shipments; average time between shipments three days.

Subparagraph H. Control by the military authorities of the Army postal service in France was authorized by cablegram A–1331, paragraph 1, dated May 18, 1918, and was completely assumed July 1, 1918, the month of June being occupied in the details of transfer of control and the organization of a military postal service. The strength of the United States civil postal service operating in zone of American Expeditionary Forces was approximately 300, and of these 50 selected clerks were commissioned in or employed by the military postal service. From this nucleus this service has been expanded to its present strength of 140 officers and 3,700 enlisted men, exclusive of companies' mail orderlies.

Subparagraph J. On July 1 the strength of the American Expeditionary Forces was approximately 900,000, and on November 30 its strength was approximately 1,800,000, the average monthly rate of increase from July 1 to November 1 being about 260,000. From July 1 to November 11 a great portion of these forces were engaged in active operations, which necessitated frequent, rapid, and secret movement from one sector of the battle line to another; and since November 11 continued shifting of organizations has been required by posting of an army of occupation and the withdrawal of remaining combat troops to locations better suited for their habitation than the devastated battle area.

Subparagraph K. All these required movements, together with the necessity of maintaining an uninterrupted supply of food, ammunition, and replacements to units, has limited the amount of transportation available for strictly mail purposes. Despite these conditions, the service has been improved by the establishment of over 80 additional Army post offices and railway mail service, which now consists of 28 lines, covering 14,000 miles. The average daily number of changes of status of individuals of the American Expeditionary Forces that might possibly affect the delivery of mail to individuals has totaled between 30,000 and 80,000, and these changes necessitate more readdressing of mail daily than it is estimated is required of the combined post offices of New York State.

Subparagraph L. That certain deficiencies in the postal service of the American Expeditionary Forces should develop was inevitable, and every effort has been made to correct these as rapidly as possible. When one considers, however, the comparatively short time military postal express service has been in operation and the magnitude of the task of organizing and operating this service under modern war conditions, and in a country whose transportation facilities have been strained to the utmost in order to meet its own war requirements, it is considered that what has been accomplished is a creditable record of achievement, and, due to the changed conditions and the consequent diminution of movement of troops, it is further believed that the service will now show marked improvement.

PERSHING.

RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. GRONNA. I have received a number of complaints from commercial clubs in my State. I have their letters, but I shall not present all of them to the Senate. However, I have a copy of a letter addressed to the Director General of Railroads and also to the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission showing how ruinously, I might say, the rules have been enforced and the rates increased and how they affect the small jobbing centers. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter referred to was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BISMARCK, N. DAK., December 27, 1918.

Hon. W. G. MCADOO,
Director General of Railroads, Washington, D. C.
Hon. G. B. MCGINTY,
Secretary Interstate Commerce Commission, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We are informed that the Director General of Railroads has submitted for the consideration of the Interstate Commerce Commission, State railroad commissions, and shippers tentative schedules of uniform class rates for application in various parts of this country, including one designated the standard scale of class rates for 100 per cent western territory, which includes North Dakota, and which, therefore, vitally affects the present interests and future welfare of our city as a jobbing and manufacturing center.

This matter has been carefully considered by the traffic committee of our organization, and they have directed me to transmit the following statement relative thereto:

The application of the 100 per cent western class rates to our business with no simultaneous advance in the specific or overhead rates from the Twin Cities would be disastrous to our jobbers and manufacturers. A careful check of rates shows that if the 100 per cent scale were made effective the jobbers at the Twin Cities could deliver the principal commodities of commerce to practically all points within a hundred-mile radius of Bismarck at a less freight cost than our jobbers could take delivery of solid carloads and ship to such nearby territory in less-than-carload quantities. Such an adjustment of rates we believe to be unlawful and in violation of the act to regulate commerce. Rates so constructed would encourage the waste of transportation facilities present in long less-than-carload movements as compared with carload movement to jobbing centers in consuming territory and short less-than-carload hauls to ultimate destination.

Any schedule of rates which produces waste of transportation facilities must be rejected alike by the Railroad Administration, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and all shippers who regard the conservation of transportation facilities and the proper solution of national problems as of greater consequence than some immediate personal gain or loss.

The discriminations in favor of the Twin Cities which would result from applying the 100 per cent scale to North Dakota traffic are the result of large increases in all rates, and especially the third and fourth classes, with no simultaneous increase from cities outside the State. We can see no excuse for such preferential treatment of the Twin Cities, Duluth, Chicago, etc. As a matter of fact, we are unable to find any sound reason for applying rates 33⅓ per cent higher in North Dakota than are simultaneously applied within Minnesota and for exempting interterritorial rates from any change. Traffic conditions in 75 per cent and 100 per cent territories and between those territories as far as North Dakota is concerned are substantially similar, and the proposed rate treatment is in all respects unjust as to North Dakota and unduly preferential of Minnesota and interterritorial traffic.

The net result of such freight rates would be further concentration of business and industry in our large cities, which is highly objectionable from a transportation, industrial, or sociological point of view. The freight rate schedules now in effect carry many unduly discriminatory rates which should be adjusted before uniform rates on any basis are established.

North Dakota is the only State in western classification territory which has no through commodity rates from trunk line and Central Freight Association territories from which jobbers and manufacturers must procure their supplies. If reasonable and nondiscriminatory freight rates on commodities from these territories to North Dakota were established, there could be no objection to a uniform scale of distributing rates to apply in properly defined zones which would eliminate the discriminations in favor of the Twin Cities, Duluth, Chicago, etc., referred to above.

To make the new 100 per cent scale effective without any adjustment of inbound commodity rates would seriously increase the discriminations from which the cities of North Dakota are now suffering and would threaten the very existence of many jobbing houses and industries.

For all these reasons we most earnestly early urge that the proposed 100 per cent scale of class rates shall not be made effective, and that no modification of the proposed scale shall be established without affording us an opportunity to consider the proposed rates and be heard as to their merits.

Yours, very truly,

THE BISMARCK COMMERCIAL CLUB
SPECIAL TRAFFIC COMMITTEE,
J. P. SELL, Chairman.
GEO. N. KENISTON, Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. I also have two brief statements, prepared by the Commercial Club of Bismarck, N. Dak., giving a comparison of the freight costs of jobbing canned goods from St. Paul and Bismarck in territory west of Bismarck on the Northern Pacific Railway. I ask that the statements be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. It is a matter of very great importance not only to the jobbers of my State but to all consumers as well.

There being no objection, the statements were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOTE.—A large proportion of the canned goods consumed in this territory is produced in territory east of St. Paul and the carload rates to St. Paul are the same whether the car goes on to a Bismarck jobber or into a St. Paul jobbing house. The difference in freight cost beyond St. Paul represents the relative jobbing freight-rate advantage.

Bismarck rates represent fifth class, St. Paul to Bismarck, plus fourth class Bismarck to destination.

St. Paul rates are fourth-class rates St. Paul to destination.

AFFAIRS IN GREECE.

Mr. SMOOT. I have a telegram from the Hellenes of Utah, in the form of a petition, praying for the freedom and independence of Greece, which I ask be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, although the printing of certain matter in the RECORD has been voted down by the Senate on several occasions, I should like to emphasize the propriety of the course pursued by the Senator from Utah. There is no need of printing all such telegrams and letters in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is costing more money than Senators conceive of. The Senator from Utah and I attempted, until the Senate voted us down on the proposition, to prevent the printing of matter in the RECORD that had no more business there than upon any man's private desk.

I submit it to the Senate and suggest that Senators do all they can to prevent this miscellaneous publication in the RECORD, for it is costing an enormous amount of money and nobody reads it except the party who sent it, to whom a copy of the RECORD may be sent to show that it has been printed. My motion to stop such publications has been voted down several times by the Senate, and Senators can do as they please about it. I am only doing it for the purpose of saving the money, the paper, and the expense. They are now asking 80 cents an hour to print the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There is a constant raise in pay in every department of printing, and we are piling on the Government an enormous expense in printing a lot of nonsense. I wish the Members of the Senate would take notice of the expense it is costing the Government and act accordingly.

RELIEF OF EARTHQUAKE SUFFERERS.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I present a petition from the Senate of Porto Rico asking that our Government shall assist the government of Porto Rico in looking after the welfare of the earthquake sufferers. I do not know whether this is the only petition which has been sent to our Government or not, but I think it has not been published in the RECORD, and this should perhaps be printed in the RECORD, being from the Senate of Porto Rico on a governmental matter. I therefore make that request.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A RESOLUTION PRAYING THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES FOR AID FOR THE VICTIMS OF THE EARTHQUAKES.

Whereas the people of Porto Rico, by reason of the recent earthquakes, suffer the consequences of the almost total destruction of several important towns of the island; and

Whereas such seismic phenomena have brought about the complete ruin of many families, who are now in misery; and

Whereas the insular government, in order to meet the most urgent necessities occasioned by the said phenomena, has appropriated about $1,000,000 from its scant resources for restoring and reconstructing buildings and public works and to aid the victims of said earthquakes; and

Whereas the people of Porto Rico have found it necessary to pledge its credit by the issuance of bonds and to suspend the enforcement of important laws, which carries with it serious inconveniences and delays, particularly with reference to public works urgently and imperatively required for the development and progress of the country; and

Whereas the Governor of Porto Rico, in his message in the legislature, estimates the damage caused by the earthquakes as amounting to over $3,000,000, an estimate which is generally considered very much lower than the actual damages, and, furthermore, the country has exhausted all its resources, already affected by the meritorious manner in which it contributed to the victory of the United States, which have so brilliantly defended the cause of liberty, justice, and democracy of the world; and

Whereas magnanimous France, momentarily setting aside her overwhelming problems, associated herself with this people in their suffering and has come forward with material aid for the relief of the victims of the earthquakes, and such noble example has been followed by other nations; and

Whereas the generosity shown by the glorious American Nation toward the Old Continent in aid of the indigent poor in times of terrible anxiety and her chivalrous protection given Martinique when the latter was devastated by the last volcanic eruption of Mount Pelee can not be forgotten: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of Porto Rico, That the cooperation of the Congress of the United States be, and the same is hereby, petitioned efficiently to render aid to the aforesaid victims by appropriating a sum to be covered into the treasury of Porto Rico and to be disposed of by the Legislature of Porto Rico as the Congress may direct; and be it further

Resolved, That a printed copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President and to each Member of the House of Representatives and of the Senate of the United States and to the Resident Commissioner for Porto Rico in Washington.

I, Eugenio Astol, acting secretary of the Senate of Porto Rico, do hereby certify that the preceding resolution is a true and correct copy of senate resolution 13, adopted by the Senate of Porto Rico at San Juan, P. R., this 7th day of December, 1918.

[SEAL.] EUGENIO ASTOL.

Acting Secretary of the Senate.

CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

Mr. KING. I have received a number of letters and petitions in view of the resolution which I offered a few days ago asking the State Department to furnish certain information relative to the claims of American citizens against the Republic of Mexico. As a type of one of the letters I shall send to the desk, but shall not ask to have read or put in the RECORD, a letter which I move be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is a letter from Chief Justice Bartch, formerly of the Supreme Court of the State of Utah, referring to these claims and to the indignities and outrages to which American citizens have been subjected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

DISTRICT AND LOCAL DRAFT BOARDS.

Mr. KING. I have received a large number of petitions from district and local boards praying for legislation conferring upon them some sort of military rank. I have also received a number of letters protesting against conferring any sort of recognition upon them. I send to the desk and ask to have referred to the Committee on Military Affairs two types of the communications that I am receiving.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letters will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMISSIONS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. KING. I have also received a great many letters in reference to the action of the War Department in promulgating a letter on the 11th day of November which in effect prohibited the granting of any further commissions in the Army or granting commissions to those who had been recommended. As a type of the hundreds of letters that I have received protesting against the order of the Secretary of War and urging that some sort of legislation should be enacted if necessary in order to remove this evil, I send to the desk the following letter and ask to have it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer for the RECORD without reading, resolutions of the County Quarterly Court of Davidson County, Tenn., upon the question of Government ownership of railroads, and ask that they may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that course will be taken.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATE OF TENNESSEE, Davidson County:

County quarterly court of said county met pursuant to adjournment at the courthouse in Nashville Tuesday afternoon, January 7, 1919. Present and presiding his honor Litton Hickman, judge and chairman, and a quorum of the justices of the peace, when, among other things, the following proceeding was had, to wit:

Title: A resolution by the Davidson County Court opposing any further centralization of power through the ownership by the Government of the public utilities of the Nation.

The following resolution was offered by Esquires Douglas, Dorris, and Coode:

"Be it resolved by the quarterly county court of Davidson County, Tenn., in quarterly session assembled:

"Whereas in accordance with an act of Congress the Hon. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, by various proclamations did take from private ownership and put under Government management and control railroads, telegraph lines, and telephone facilities of the United States of America; and

"Whereas it was the evident purpose in taking over these various public utilities at the time to so conduct them that the great war that was being fought by the allied nations of the world against the central powers could be conducted in a more efficient manner by laying aside the rights of each individual and of each corporation and making them subservient to the winning of the war; and

"Whereas now that the armistice has been entered into and peace negotiations are in progress, rendering that community of purpose unnecessary; and

"Whereas the Hon. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, in a personal address before Congress has plainly stated to Congress that he has no solution to offer so far as the future of the railroads of America are concerned and looks to Congress to formulate plans for the future guidance in these matters; and

"Whereas Congress in its wisdom may adopt the plan of some who favor Government ownership, or, on the other hand, it may look to the country for guidance and for instructions as to how best to proceed; and

"Whereas the Davidson County Court is elected for the purpose of conducting the affairs of Davidson County in such a way as to promote health, wealth, and happiness of those residents living within its boundaries; and

"Whereas the members of the Davidson County Court, elected by the people to represent the interests of the people, believe that Government ownership of public utilities is undesirable, but that some method should be adopted by Congress authorizing the return of the railroads, telegraph, and telephone properties in the near future to their rightful owners, but under such Government supervision as will protect the interests of the general public in so far as the interests of the general public relate to these public utilities; and

"Whereas the Davidson County Court desires to be put strictly on record as having opposed the centralization of power, believing that this one fact did more to destroy the harmony of nations than did any other one given thing: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Davidson County Court in quarterly session assembled, at its January term, 1919, That it hereby declares itself unalterably opposed to any effort by the Congress of the United States looking to any greater centralization of power than existed prior to the war of 1914–1918; and be it further

"Resolved, That this court, through its Representatives in Congress, petition the Congress of the United States to return, by legislative enactment, to private ownership those public utilities that were taken over by the United States Government as a war contingency; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Davidson County Court favors the enactment by Congress of the United States of such measures of Government supervision as will protect the interests of the general public against the unscrupulous dealings of either capital or labor in the management or the operation of the public utilities of the Nation; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this court and additional copies be sent to the Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS and to the two United States Senators, Senators MCKELLAR and SHIELDS.

"S. G. DOUGLAS (chairman).
"JNO. COODE.
"F. M. DORRIS."

Moved and seconded that the foregoing resolution be adopted.

A true copy.

ROMANS HARLEY, Clerk.

ARMY IDENTIFICATION.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to an article in the Memphis Commercial-Appeal of Tennessee of January 10, in which the statement is made that it is proposed by the War Department to abolish all marks of divisional pride. I quote from that statement the following:

It is also declared that soldiers must leave off Army and division identification marks—

I am speaking now of overseas soldiers.

If this is true, it means the First Division must rip off those meaningful figures—ones from their left shoulders—the Rainbows must drop that scrambled-egg semicircle, the immortal Second must abandon the picturesque star and Indian head, the Seventy-seventh must put away its Statue of Liberty, and all other tags of identification must depart. The striking big, black letter A, which designated Liggett's first army during the days of Argonne, would doubtless be included in the order, along with the gorgeous red, white, and blue targets which the Third Army of Occupation sports on its shoulders.

Mr. President, I am going to ask permission to have the whole article inserted in the RECORD, with the statement that I do not for a moment believe the War Department would make such an order as to the soldiers who have served abroad. I am quite confident that the department does not contemplate making any such order; but, to be on the safe side, I am asking to have this article inserted in the RECORD, together with a letter from Mr. Charles E. Morrow, of Memphis, Tenn., who has called it to my attention, and I do so for the purpose of protesting even against any such contemplated action.

I might say that the letter largely goes to the proposition of a resolution that I offered several days ago, which has been reported favorably to this body by the Committee on Military Affairs, calling upon the Secretary of War to report as to overseas promotions, in view of this body taking such action with reference to the report after it comes in as may be necessary. I therefore ask that both the letter and the article be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MEMPHIS, TENN., January 11, 1919.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: The inclosed article appeared in the Commercial Appeal of yesterday, and knowing your interest in the soldier boys I am sending it to you fearing you may not have seen it. Of course, it may be that this is merely idle rumor sent over by the correspondent to fill space, but if there is any foundation for the story I think it very small business on the part of the authorities and calculated to expand the disappointment and discontent that I hear so much of every day. It does seem to me that if there was ever any excuse for pinning the tags onto the combat forces who bore the brunt of the fighting that they should be permitted to wear them home and until after they are mustered out. Scarce a day passes now that young officers who have seen the hot fighting and have been mustered out drop in to see me, and while they are commendably cautious in their criticism they nearly all find it difficult to conceal their disgust that they find themselves bowing and saluting captains and majors who entered the service after these boys had been fighting for months, and find that they are just where they started as far as their commissions are concerned, and the men who were never outside of the camps on this side have received high office.

Yesterday a young second lieutenant who was shot through the groin at the battle of Soissons and has been in the hospital practically ever since, but is now discharged from the service, came in to see me and was commenting upon the fact that he had met a friend of his who had used every effort to dodge the draft but was finally caught, finally landed in a camp, and came out a major though he had never been out of this country, while this boy who had fought and suffered was mustered out just where he went in, a second lieutenant, notwithstanding when his command was shot to pieces and the commanding officer in requesting replacement officers asked that no men above the grade of second lieutenant be sent him as he wished to promote some of his second lieutenants. No men were sent below the grade of first lieutenant so that the seconds were left where they were, and he for one was mustered out just where he went in. He said he was going to get out of his uniform to-day, and it was the last time he ever expected to be seen in one. This is not the spirit these men should have and probably would not be if they felt that justice had been done them. I think that all of the young officers who are now with the army of occupation who saw the worst of the fighting should be advanced in grade, not only for the honor but for financial reasons, as these men being kept over there so long after the others have been sent home will find on their return that the positions they filled in civil life will have been filled by the earlier arrivals and the patriotic spirit of the employers will have cooled down, if not died out entirely, and these men will find it difficult to secure their old jobs or get new ones.

I am writing you regarding this matter knowing your interest in these boys and with the hope that such presentment may be made to the proper officials as will correct what they seem to regard as a great injustice; I take it, of course, that the high command know their business, but they may not be familiar with the sentiment of the people at home who look at the thing from a common-sense point of view rather than a military one.

Very sincerely, yours, C. E. MORROW.

MAY ABOLISH MARKS OF DIVISIONAL PRIDE—REPORTED THAT OVERSEAS INSIGNIA MAY BE ORDERED OFF—WOULD DROWN SENTIMENT—OVERSEAS HEROES MAY BE FORCED TO REMOVE OVERSEAS CAPS AND SAM BROWN BELTS ON RETURN TO STATES—MANY WILL WEAR FOREIGN DECORATIONS FOR HEROISM.

[By Damon Runyon, Universal Service staff correspondent.]

WITH THE AMERICAN ARMY OF OCCUPATION AT COBLENZ, January 9.

According to reports printed over here, American officers and soldiers returning to the United States will not be permitted to wear many little items of apparel which will distinguish them as members not only of the overseas forces but of combat divisions.

It is said that officers can not wear Sam Brown belts, trench overcoats, or overseas caps. This seems to the writer not only rather absurd but a real hardship upon the officers.

The most of them will leave the Army as soon after their return as it is possible to do so. Few of them have any other coats than trench coats. This is especially true of those who put in most of their time on the fighting line. Not many of them have other headgear than overseas caps. The order means that they will have to go to the additional expense of buying new equipment, which they will be putting away in a few weeks, or perhaps days. Many of them, too, will have to buy new tunics if they abandon their Sam Brown belts, because months of wearing have either left indelible marks where leather came into contact with cloth or worn it out altogether.

It is also declared that soldiers must leave off their Army and division identification marks. If this is true, it means the First Division must rip off those meaningful figure ones from their left shoulders; the Rainbows must drop that scrambled-egg semicircle; the immortal Second must abandon the picturesque star and Indian head; the Seventy-seventh must put away its Statue of Liberty, and all other tags of identification must depart. The striking big black letter "A" which designated Liggett's First Army during the days of Argonne would doubtless be included in the order, along with the gorgeous red, white, and blue target which the Third Army of Occupation sports on its shoulders.

Abolishing their various marks is not a matter of great importance as compared to the other proposition, but it would be a shame if the people of the States do not get to see their soldiers as they are now, not as they are refurnished by some one whose ideas may be sound enough from a military standpoint, but who obviously lacks sentiment.

Soldiers like little touches to their uniforms, such as divisional marks. They are very proud of them. Moreover, it is very convenient, because its easy to identify a man's outfit at a glance. It seems to us that officers and men ought to be permitted to come home just as they are. There is one thing that nobody will deny them wearing—that's their rewards for valor. Many a man will have a distinguished-service cross and the Croix de Guerre across his chest when he lands in America. Some of them have Legions of Honor and various British decorations, too. It will be pretty hard to disguise them by any order in such a way that they'll look anything but their true characters as members of divisions that won the war.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 4603) to further protect interstate and foreign commerce against bribery and other corrupt trade practices, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HARDING, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3063) for the repair, preservation, care, and future maintenance of the restored historical naval brig Niagara, Commodore Oliver Hazard Perry's flagship in the Battle of Lake Erie (Rept. No. 642); and

A bill (S. 4261) to provide that petty officers, noncommissioned officers, and enlisted men of the United States Navy and Marine Corps on the retired list who had creditable Civil War service shall receive the rank or rating and the pay of the next higher enlisted grade (Rept. No. 643).

THOMAS CAMPBELL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On December 20, 1918, the bill (H. R. 1873) for the relief of Thomas Campbell was received from the House and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. This was an erroneous reference. I ask that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which has proper jurisdiction over it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

HOUSING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, in the nature of a report from a committee, I desire to state that at an informal meeting on Friday last of many members of the Committee on the District of Columbia the question of extending the life of the antirent profiteering joint resolution, which now is in operation in this District, and which will extend until the declaration of peace, was considered by those members of the committee who were present; and it was agreed that it might be advisable for me to make the statement that the sentiment and the feeling of the committee, so far as there represented, was opposed to a further continuance of the provisions of that joint resolution beyond the declaration of peace. It was thought that it might be wise to notify the people of the city of Washington, both landlords and tenants, that the sentiment of that committee as indicated—and it was unanimous, so far as the members were present—was that it would be a good plan to let the joint resolution expire with the declaration of peace and conditions in Washington, so far as the renting of property was concerned, assume a normal condition.

It was also believed that that might be an inducement toward the diminution of the large number of unnecessary clerks believed to be in Washington, and that if it were not made too easy for them to remain they would have a tendency to leave the District. The committee, so far as its members were present and expressed themselves, thought that the whole provisions of that joint resolution should not be extended further than under the existing law.

DISPOSAL OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I introduce a bill at the request of the Secretary of War, authorizing the President to sell real or personal property, purchased or acquired by the United States in connection with or incidental to the prosecution of the existing war, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I will state, however, that I am now preparing a bill which will cover not only the property mentioned in this bill, but all surplus property that the Government possesses, so that it may be in the hands of a more centralized body.

The bill (S. 5321) authorizing the President to sell real or personal property purchased or acquired by the United States in connection with or incidental to the prosecution of the existing war was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RELIEF OF DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I send to the Secretary's desk a bill which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I am going to ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes to submit some observations on the subject treated in this bill.

The bill (S. 5322) for the relief of discharged soldiers was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be paid to each honorably discharged enlisted man and officer of the Army who served with the American Expeditionary Forces abroad, who may have served not less than 60 days between April 6, 1917, and January 1, 1919, the total sum of $216, in six equal monthly payments, as a gratuity, and that there shall be paid to each honorably discharged enlisted man and officer of the Army who served in the United States, who may have served not less than 60 days between April 6, 1917, and January 1, 1919, the total sum of $180, in six equal monthly payments, as a gratuity, the first of such payments to be made at the time of his discharge, or within 30 days after the approval of this act where such enlisted man or officer has been heretofore discharged, payments to be made under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That a total of not exceeding $216 and $180, respectively, shall be paid to any discharged soldier, irrespective of the number of times discharged.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I have often said that the only light which we have to guide our uncertain footsteps through the darkness of the future shines out from the experiences and trials of the past; but present conditions are so unlike and dissimilar to conditions that ever existed before in the world's history that I am unwillingly driven to the conclusion that what has happened in the immediate past furnishes no reliable guide or suggestion as to what may happen in the immediate or remote future. The world is mad, crazed with a blood lust and greed for gain, a kind of Cæsarean mania seems to have taken possession of the brains of some men ambitious for world power, and, taking it all in all, the moral viewpoint has changed and the national and international sense of justice altogether distorted.

There is much truth in the suggestion made by a writer, whose name I can not now recall, that "Nineteenth century civilization has broken down. There is a collapse of human moral energy, a revival of the primitive barbaric instincts and the fierce endeavor to have one's little private will by force * * *. Through all this seething chaos run evil currents of intrigue after intrigue, monarchical, bolshevist, financial, imperialistic, particularist, clerical, atheist. Up through the European chaos is surely creeping the menace not of socialism but of Bolshevism, which is the revengeful shadow of reckless modern materialism."

Having sown to the wind, the world is now reaping the horrible harvest of the whirlwind. The people of Russia, after generations of oppression, "profaned and disinherited," are now drunken with their suddenly acquired freedom and independence. The ignorance which the rich few fostered and forced upon the unfortunate many, tainted with the spirit of hate and revenge, unbridled and unrestrained, is now exemplifying the biblical injunction, "Whatsoever ye sow, that shall ye also reap."

The peasants of Russia for generations have borne the weight of taxation, toiled without ceasing, and in silent suffering leaned upon the hoe and gazed upon the ground; the emptiness of ages is shown in their faces and on their backs the burden of the world. The masters, lords, and rulers of those lands are now called upon to reckon with these men, to answer the "brute question in the hour when whirlwinds of rebellion shake the world." It presents a pathetic spectacle and demonstrates the inevitable consequences of "man's inhumanity to man."

The cruel, grasping greed and the conscienceless reign of the rich are responsible for the crimes of the vicious, ignorant Bolshevists, whose mistakes excite emotions of commiseration in my breast rather than feelings of hate. Whatever excesses they may have perpetrated—and they are probably many—their conduct is in no respect more inhuman, illegal, reprehensible, or revolutionary than the conduct of their soulless, conscienceless, plutocratic predecessors.

Their predecessors knew better; they possibly do not. Man is the creature of heredity and environment. The perfect man is the evolution of the best economic, sanitary, and social condition. Starvation, ignorance, living in an atmosphere saturated with crime for many generations never produced a Gladstone or a Washington. A child born of ignorant, vicious parents and reared in squalor and pinching indigence is not expected to have the breadth of mental vision, the delicate sense of right, and moral conscience that one would naturally have born and reared amidst different, better environments.

I can not think of the situation in Russia but that this picture appears before my mental vision—

> But behold a fellow mortal fashioned on another plan:
> Coarse, deformed, and misbegotten—more a devil than a man—
> Heir to sin and want and sorrow, born without a sense of shame,
> Stung by sharp, keen, fierce desires burning in his blood like flame;
> Weak, unbalanced, repulsive—reveling in sensual things;
> If he hath a soul within him, 'tis a soul that never sings—
> 'Tis a soul that hath no wings!
> He was born without the power or the impulse to forbear
> When the dumb, resistless forces of the cycles centered there.

The picture is a little overdrawn, but it serves the purpose of the illustration.

Mr. President, it is a matter of fact that the men and women who labor in this world have never had a fair share of the products of their own toil.

The people whose labor produces the vital necessities of life, the things that clothe and feed the world, have not been given a square deal in the past and are not given a square deal in the present. When that fact dawns upon the obfuscated intellect of the toiler, if he should be incited, even in a spirit of revenge, to rise in the fullness of his unrestricted physical force, it may not be surprising or unexpected if he should go to excesses in dealing with his former oppressors. I do not approve or condone any form of injustice or lawlessness, but I am convinced that in the court where conscience sits as judge, when all the facts are considered, there will be found for the unfortunate revolutionists of Europe some mitigating circumstances.

The many remedies or solutions which have been proposed for the great problems which confront the world are as varied and multitudinous as the pebbles of the sea are many formed. Some are good, some chimerical, and others utterly impracticable. There is but one solution of this problem, I think, there is but one universal solvent, and that is justice. If we try that in America, we shall win where other countries have failed in meeting the great issues which confront the complex civilization of this century.

I propose in the bill I have just introduced that Congress give to the soldiers six months' extra pay. It will be money well invested; it will go to the masses of the people, where it will be distributed, and in turn soon find its way back to the channels of trade and finally to the Treasury of the United States. These men were taken away from their homes by force, by the Prussian system of conscription, and now, when they go back they will necessarily find conditions disorganized and in some instances discouraging. This small pittance from the Government will help to bridge the chasm and will provide the necessaries of life while the soldier is taking up the thread where he left off two years ago. We had better spend money in this way than distribute it among the poor of Europe. If I had my way, I would help the suffering in every land, but I would first take care of my own household. The American statesman who neglects America to scatter charity with a royal hand throughout Europe when there is suffering and want here at home is not any better than the man mentioned in the Scripture who neglects his own household. Six months of extra pay to the soldier will stimulate production, give encouragement and hope. It will not be a donation or charity, but rather an acknowledgment of the Nation's gratitude, and the best investment the American people could make through their Government for the good of all. Greater love hath no man for his country than the man who is willing to give his life to keep his country's flag triumphant and stainless in the air. These men have shown their love and devotion to the flag, and it is as little as the country can afford to do to tax the great substantially untaxed war-made fortunes for the consolation and comfort of the soldier and his family. If in America permanent peace shall follow this war, we must provide against the wolf of want howling at the door, especially of the men who bared their heroic breasts to the storm of war. Bolshevism is not a contagious social disease, but, like scurvy and pellagra, the result of lack of nutrition, or malnutrition.

You can not stop its growth by quarantining against it. It can not be stamped out by proscriptive legislation, punishment, starvation, and the enactment of penal statutes. You might as well undertake to stop the spread of influenza by murdering the patient as to limit the growth of this social disease by harsh and criminal legislation. The panacea for this disease and all other similar social disorders will be found in giving the laboring people of the world an equal chance in the race of life with the capitalists. Give them good wages, enough of the products of their own toil to furnish comfortable homes, to educate their children, and otherwise improve their manner of living, and then there will be no more Bolshevism or conflicts between capital and labor.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

CONTROL OF WATER POWER.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, during the early days of this session the question of water-power legislation was passed upon. In fact, such legislation has passed the Senate at two different sessions. The bill involving that legislation went to the other House, where a bill was substituted for the Senate bill, and the matter is now in conference. The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is the chairman of the conference committee. It has developed that the condition of his health will not permit him to attend the sessions of the conference committee at the present time, and perhaps he will not be able to return to the city for some time. It is a very important measure and demands are coming from every section of the country for its passage. I therefore ask that the Senator from Tennessee be relieved, at least temporarily, from service on the conference committee and that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, be substituted as one of the conferees in his place in order that we may get to work on the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMERICAN TROOPS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 411), as follows:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, the soldiers of the United States, as soon as practicable, should be withdrawn from Russia.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I do not assume to discuss the resolution this morning. I wish it to lie upon the table that it may be taken up during the week. I desire to give notice that during the week I shall ask that it be taken up for consideration and then in detail I shall discuss it. But that the Senate may be informed concerning some of the facts which recently have developed, I wish to read one paragraph, with their consent, of Northcliffe's article appearing in this morning's press, as follows:

One of the chief mysteries of the situation is the result of the great shroud that covers Russia. The only news coming out of Russia is of two kinds, wireless sent out by Lenine and Trotzky, of the Bolsheviki government and wireless of Petliura, president of the Ukraine government. The other kind of news is that brought out of Russia by refugees, or which is spread by the people flying from the Bolsheviki armies in Esthonia and Poland. I have for some time been of the opinion that the world powers should sink their pride for the moment and get into communication with the Bolsheviki with the purpose of sending an allied commission into Russia to find out what is really going on there. Such a commission should be accompanied by persons whom Russians do not regard as hostile. One is, I believe, the former head of your Red Cross in Russia, Raymond Robins. There is an English writer named Arthur Ransome. I have no right to use their names, but the emergency is great and quick action is necessary. The world must know what is really happening.

OPPOSES ARMY IN RUSSIA.

We are beset by appeals to send warlike missions. One suggestion is that we should have an expeditionary army in the Baltic Province; another that we should send armed forces from Odessa and Kief, joining up with the Ukrainians. So far as Great Britain is concerned, any attempt to transfer further British troops to Russia will be resented fiercely by our people. We have had more than four and a half years of war, and our soldiers did not enlist for the purpose of policing Russia. I have no doubt that when our army is demobilized an army could easily be raised in Great Britain, composed of adventurous spirits, who would go anywhere they were sent, but it seems to me imperative that we should first find out what is happening among those 150,000,000 of people.

I offer this resolution, Mr. President, because more than a month ago, couched in the most respectful language, I introduced a precatory resolution, which was referred to the Foreign Relations Committee, a precatory resolution which merely begged that we be informed concerning our policy in Russia. That resolution has been bottled up in the Foreign Relations Committee; and therefore I ask that this resolution lie upon the table in order that it may be taken up with very little delay.

It is obvious, from the fact that the Government will not because it can not answer our inquiry of more than a month ago, that we have no policy in Russia, and that the Government of the United States can not respond to the resolution because it has not any policy at all in Russia to-day. We are neither one nor the other; we are neither intervening in sufficient force to be of consequence, nor are we getting out of Russia. We are to-day simply inviting disaster in Russia, and interfering here and there, without knowing why, and in matters, too, in which we have no concern.

I therefore offer this resolution, and, with the permission of the Senate, will speak at length upon it during the week.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 13274. An act to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H. R. 13462. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STERLING obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I inquire if the morning business is over?

Mr. STERLING. I had understood that the morning business was over.

Mr. THOMAS. I am making the inquiry. I have no information on that point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any further morning business? The Chair hears none, and the morning business is closed. The Chair desires to inquire what the Senate is going to do with its Calendar Monday rule?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, what is the order of business? Is the calendar in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. This day has been set apart by a rule of the Senate as Calendar Monday. At the conclusion of the morning business the calendar is to be proceeded with, under the rule. The Senator from South Dakota is proceeding to address the Senate upon the subject of a league of nations.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if that is the order of business, I do not want to occupy the time of the Senate to the exclusion of any business before it. I took it for granted that the morning business being closed, and the Vice President having so announced, I was at liberty to proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from South Dakota may be allowed to proceed with his remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no objection. I had given notice at the last meeting of the Senate that at the close of the morning business to-day I would address the Senate, but I am perfectly willing to postpone what I have to say until a later time.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I gave a like notice on Thursday last that at the conclusion of the morning business to-day I would address the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. It is a matter of no importance, in any event. I cheerfully yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The only interest the Chair has in the matter is that this looks to the Chair like a fool rule that has been adopted by the Senate, requiring Monday to be set aside for the calling of the calendar. It has not been complied with, to the Chair's knowledge, since it has been adopted.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in venturing to discuss briefly the proposal for a league of nations to enforce peace, I shall take some things for granted. I shall concede, for example, that the treaty negotiating power is under our Constitution wholly in the hands of the President; that he can initiate the proceedings and on behalf of the United States carry them on to the point where the completed document is signed by the representatives of the high contracting parties; that up to that point he is under no legal or moral obligation to consult the Senate either as to the subject matter, the terms, or the form of the treaty.

As a corollary of this the Senate has no right, legal or moral, to ask the President to disclose to the Senate his purposes or views in regard to any treaty which may be in contemplation.

From the standpoint of the respective rights of the Executive and the Senate it is of no consequence that the situation requiring a treaty is an exceedingly grave one, or that its consequences are bound to be of world importance, or that the Senate must ratify it if it is to become a binding treaty, or that harmony of thought and action between the President and Senate with the resulting public benefit would flow from some exchange of views. The President may, notwithstanding all these considerations, wholly abstain from communicating with the Senate or with its Committee on Foreign Relations or from in any way taking the Senate or any of the Members of the Senate into his confidence.

This is his right. The Senate may be embarrassed by disclosures made pending the negotiations or by the intermingling of the wise and unwise or the safe and the perilous in the terms of the treaty, but its right to consider and act thereon does not begin until the President lays the finished treaty before the Senate with his message requesting the ratification thereof.

That these are the conditions under which treaties may be made and ratified will, I think, be conceded by every Member of the Senate, even by the distinguished Senators from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], whose positions in regard to what should be the subjects for consideration at the coming peace conference have been made special targets for criticism by certain Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

I am not aware that either of the two Senators mentioned hold or have expressed any other view of the powers and rights of the President and Senate, respectively, than those I have mentioned, and yet Senators on the majority side have, while ostensibly discussing the question of a league of nations, laboriously set up a man of straw, and for purposes of refutation have assumed in their arguments that Senators on this side of the Chamber had charged the President with some usurpation of power and had denied to the Senate certain legal rights in the matter of negotiating the coming peace treaty.

Nothing, it seems to me, from what I have heard stated here on the floor and from what I know of the opinions of Senators, can be further from the fact. The Senators from Massachusetts and Pennsylvania surely need no defense nor does their attitude need any explanation from me. I mention the circumstance because of the zeal it discloses on the part of Senators on the other side in defending the President against any criticism because of his aloofness in a matter so absorbing, so vital to ourselves, and so closely related to the welfare of the world. There are some fine precedents for a different course, but if it be said that the President pursues the customary course, I believe it a custom which would be "more honored in the breach than in the observance," and that in a time like this, especially, it would be well if the Senate could be advised, even if it is not permitted to advise, in advance.

Mr. President, the imminent and all-absorbing question is not exactly whether we shall ever have a league of nations to enfore peace, but whether we must have it now; whether its creation must consume the precious time of the peace conference, whose business should be to settle at the earliest possible day the momentous issues arising immediately out of this war. The rights of the allies on the one hand and the obligations of the central powers on the other hand should as soon as possible be definitely known. The oppressed nationalities to whom assurances have been given should be speedily put in the way of realizing their long-cherished national ideals. Boundaries must be adjusted.

To my mind the work of the peace conference should be to take careful account of causes, responsibilities, methods, and conduct of the war; of the adjustments that will best insure against a recurrence of war; an account also of the losses sustained by pillage, by burning, by any means in violation of international law, and then to define the boundaries of the new sovereign States to be carved out of enemy or other territory. These things done and well done will entitle the peace conference to the lasting gratitude of the lovers of peace and justice everywhere.

My thought is that the relations and mutual purposes of the allied nations are such as themselves constitute an almost perfect guaranty against war as between themselves, and a reasonable guaranty of the peace of the world; that there are difficulties in the way of establishing a league to enforce peace which can not at this time be overcome; that in the interests of all concerned the peace conference should not be burdened with or delayed by the consideration of a constitution for such a league; that the definite peace which is to mark the end of the great war and not a league of nations is the goal to which all the talents, learning, and experience of the commissioners to negotiate peace should be directed; that in addition to the difficulties sure to be encountered in the organization of such a league it is a matter of grave doubt whether its decisions can ever be made effectual against any nation not willing to abide by them; and that in the last analysis we shall have to depend on the friendship and good faith of the nations of the world rather than force for our guaranty of peace.

"But now we know each other still better. We have lived together; we have defended together the same sacred cause; we have together saved mankind; we are friends forever." These are words from the eloquent message of the President of the French Republic to the American people received New Year's Day. A fitting New Year's greeting. A splendid epitome, the message is, of mutual sympathies, of mutual struggle, of mutual ideals in the cause of free government and the rights of humanity.

What need, we may well ask, of a formal league with its arbitral tribunal, with its armament to carry out and enforce the decrees of that tribunal, between nations bound by such ties as these? For all the future the thoughts of the people of these two Republics will hark back to the causes which gave them birth; to Washington and Franklin; to Lafayette and Rochambeau, and to the common perils and sacrifices in the struggle just ended to rid the world of the last and greatest menace to freedom and civilization.

As against the binding force of ties such as these it might be said: "Beware the solemn and formal pact with its many refinements, its possible misinterpretations, and with armed force looming always in the background as its sanction."

For without such a pact France and the United States are "friends forever." No league can improve upon that relation.

And how stands the case with another ally, Great Britain? President Nicholas Murray Butler, of Columbia University, in his admirable preface to Prof. Dunning's work entitled "The British Empire and the United States," written in celebration of the 100 years of peace between Great Britain and our country since the signing of the treaty of Ghent, has this to say: "There have been more tempting occasions for misunderstanding and armed conflict between the British Empire and the United States than between the United States and all other nations of the earth combined."

But he further says: "Having been itself carved by revolution from the side of the British Empire, it is but natural that both the bonds of friendship and the causes for jealousy should be more numerous between the United States and the British Empire than between the United States and any other people. This is a plain historical fact which must be accepted by those who guide opinion and frame public policies."

Happily the bonds of friendship have prevailed over all the numerous causes for jealousy. The hope expressed in the toast proposed by John Quincy Adams at the banquet which marked the conclusion of the treaty of Ghent has been more than realized: "Ghent, the city of peace; may the gates of the temple of Janus here closed not be opened again for a century."

Nor have they been. The treaty of Ghent settled little else than that it ended our last war with Great Britain. The British alleged right of impressment, the main cause of the war, the question of disarmament on the Great Lakes, the boundaries to the Northeast and the Northwest, the seal and fisheries questions were all left, though not without serious friction at times, for adjustment to the patience, skill, mutual regard, and successful diplomacy of after years. And the "after years" have brought their multitude of questions and controversies even more exciting and perplexing than those known to exist at the time of the treaty of 1814; among them the Oregon question, the Isthmian Canal, the many causes of friction growing out of the Civil War, including that of the Alabama claims, the Venezuelan boundaries dispute, and other questions growing out of the Monroe doctrine, the Alaskan boundary dispute, and a hundred others more or less threatening our peaceful relations, but all settled by diplomacy or by the friendly arbitration which came as a result of the negotiations.

And there is that great boundary line of more than 3,000 miles without a fort, or a soldier even, to guard the territory or the peace of the people on either side. If anyone had been skeptical about the future relations of Great Britain and the United States and had looked upon Great Britain as at heart unfriendly to the United States, jealous of her growing commerce and power, arrogant when she deemed the advantage to be on her side, and biding the time when she might use that advantage, some study of the history of the relations of the two nations ought to have reassured him that no breach in international relations could be more unlikely or remote than that of war between ourselves and the mother country.

Back of all diplomacy, back of the self-restraint and skill of statesmen on either side, exercised for the purpose of averting war, is the soul of these two peoples, largely of common origin, of common language, and common political and social ideals. The compelling, binding influence of all together is such that if Great Britain and the United States should ever go to war with each other it will be for a cause and under circumstances which no league of nations can prevent or control.

As with France, so with Great Britain; we have shared with her in the same great danger, fought with her for the same great cause; her merchant marine has aided us; her navy has protected us. These things make a great, new, and, I believe, an indissoluble tie between us. Nor shall insidious anti-British or pro-German propaganda, whether directed from abroad or disseminated by certain newspapers at home, prevail against it.

And so here is this trinity of nations; the spirits of their brave sons, whose blood shed so freely commingles in the soil of stricken Belgium and enduring France will, through the long years to come, plead with compelling power for peace, amity, and good will between them.

I do not forget Italy or the great sacrifice of men and means she has made or the valiant service her armies rendered the common cause in holding and at last, under almost insuperable difficulties, defeating the flower of the Austrian Army on the Italian front. I confess to sympathy with her in her claim for Italia Irredenta. The recognition of the claims of other nationalities in Austria-Hungary, in the Balkan States, and in Russia emphasizes her right. But Italy with the other three great nations, the tie between which I have feebly described, make the four who are to be "friends forever" and for the adjustment of whose relations with each other no formal league of nations to enforce peace is required.

I am coming to the heart of the inquiry. I am not here declaring against a league of nations—even a league to enforce peace. But I shall want to know why, under the conditions described and as we all know them, the question must be urged with such persistence now and to the extent that an agreement that the peace conference shall constitute or organize a league of nations to enforce peace is made, as it were, a condition precedent to any peace conference at all.

In addition to the considerations which I have named as applicable to Great Britain, France, Italy, and the United States are these: Germany is beaten and prostrate—unrepentant, it may be, but prostrate from a military point of view. She will not be a factor in framing the terms of peace no more than she was in framing the armistice her commissioners so abjectly signed. So with Austria-Hungary. So with Bulgaria and Turkey. No government exists in Russia that any of the great powers has recognized save Germany. Will Russia be present at the peace conference? She could not now be a member of a league of nations if one were formed. One of the great questions which properly and most probably will receive the early attention of the conference is the occupation of Russian territory by allied forces. What is the status of the forces there now? How long shall they remain? These questions discussed with so much spirit here in the Senate emphasize the need of early action by the peace conference. Until then let there be the status quo, at least so far as allied occupation is concerned. There can be no assurance of permanent peace with class war in Russia and Germany as the order of the day. The situation is desperately uncertain, and it is a part of our duty to see that allied Bolshevism does not make for naught the splendid victory for liberty and for law and order we have just won.

We at first welcomed the revolution in Russia. We thought it one grand step in making the world safe for democracy. But Bolshevism is not democracy. Both the interests of democracy and of peace demand that the allies do not now abandon Russia.

Belgium will, of course, have a proud and honored place at the peace council table. Roumania and Serbia will likewise be admitted. Denmark, Holland, Sweden, and Norway, nor either, was a party to the war. Their rights and interests will be respected and protected, but whether at a peace conference or as members of a league of nations their influence would be negligible or slight at least. Peace terms will be imposed and policies determined by the allied nations who have fought this war to a successful conclusion—to a peace with victory. And these allied nations already constitute a league, and the ever-to-be-praised thing about it is that it is voluntary and unconstrained by any thought that the armed force of the league may be used against any member nation.

They have together fought a holy war against a common and cruel foe. They are capable of making a just and righteous peace, and that, too, without the surrender of any of the attributes of a sovereign nation or the right to develop their own national ideals or to defend by force of arms, if need be, their rights from invasion by any other nation in the world.

So, Mr. President, as a practical consideration, the only nations whose voice and influence will be potent in a league to enforce peace are in league to-day and are destined to remain in it long after the final word is said and all the representatives of the high contracting parties have for their respective governments attached their signatures to the treaty of peace.

Admittedly it will take a long time to frame the constitution for a league of nations—longer than the settlement of the questions growing immediately out of the war. What the number of the congress or the assembly of the league? What the basis or ratio of representation, or shall each sovereign nation be entitled to one vote? In other words, shall the United States and Serbia stand on the same footing in determining the issues of war and peace? For what councils or tribunals shall provision be made? To what extent shall they be representative of the nations constituting the league? What shall be the means for the enforcement of the decisions of the league made through its arbitral tribunal or otherwise? Shall each nation presently arm and equip its proportionate share of men and ships to be maintained by it as a part of an international army and navy for the enforcement of peace, or shall the nations disarm meanwhile and wait the decision of the league as to the forces, land or naval, or both, which they shall contribute for the coercion of any recalcitrant nation? And not least among the problems confronting our representatives will be that arising under the constitutional provision giving to Congress alone the power to declare war. No league of nations can override that.

These questions, and many more quite as grave and important, it will be the province of those who prepare the constitution for a league of nations to consider and decide—a long, laborious, and yet most delicate task.

Meanwhile a hundred other questions of present vital moment to the belligerent nations in the late war and to the world are pressing for solution. Instead of retarding or in any way delaying their adjustment, the influence of America should favor their speedy settlement.

Shall Germany pay the whole cost of the war? I express no opinion here; but she unrelentingly required the payment of a billion dollars by France in 1871 for the expenses of a war Bismarck himself had schemed to bring about, besides compelling the cession to her of Alsace-Lorraine. But how much of Britain's expenses and damages, amounting to forty-one billions, should she pay; of that of France, amounting to nearly twenty-seven billions; of Italy's, amounting to eight billions five hundred millions; of Belgium's, totaling seven billions one hundred millions; of our own, amounting to $18,000,000,000? Or shall we ask for no indemnity and be content with reparation for 375,000 tons of shipping destroyed by her illegal warfare and for the loss of over 700 civilian lives by the same wretched means?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. KING. I did not catch the last statement of the Senator. Did the Senator mean to convey the idea that France's losses and damages to property, as well as the expenses incurred in the war, aggregate only $27,000,000,000? It totals a great deal more. The losses of the French people in real and personal property aggregate over $25,000,000,000, and in addition to that France has put into the war more than $30,000,000,000 in cash.

Mr. STERLING. I will simply say to the Senator that I found this statement in a summary of expenses and damages of the different nations. I think it will fall far short of all the actual damages and losses that have been sustained by France.

Mr. KING. It has been estimated by those who have made a careful study that in labor alone it would cost nearly $20,000,000,000 to place France back in the position she was in prior to the war. In addition to that, the machinery and the other personal property destroyed would aggregate also several hundred million dollars, if not several billion dollars.

Mr. STERLING. The $27,000,000,000 which it is said France may claim is one item in an aggregate of $125,000,000,000 to $150,000,000,000, the aggregate being the probable claims of all the nations engaged in the war against Germany.

What shall be the terms of payment; what period of time should be given? Shall it be required of Germany that she repudiate her great debt or postpone for a long time its payment—the war debt she owes her own citizens—until she pays all indemnities assessed against her and makes reparation for the huge losses she has so ruthlessly inflicted upon the unoffending nations against whom she made war?

Mr. President, I was attracted by a letter written to the New York Times two or three days ago by Mr. James Phinney Baxter, in which he discusses briefly the methods of payment to be imposed upon Germany. I read it in this connection:

TO MAKE GERMANY PAY.

PORTLAND, ME., December 24, 1918.

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

From the present outlook we seem justified in the opinion that our astute representatives at the peace conference will give their coallies to understand that the American people want no indemnity for the vast losses which Germany has caused us in money and men by forcing us into the war. It is likely that to liquidate the debt which she owes the nations for damages she has caused them she would have to pay upward of $150,000,000,000, and needless discussion is going on relative to the amount of cash she can pay. I say needless discussion, for a cash payment should not for a moment be considered, as Germany is in no situation to pay a cash indemnity and should not be pressed to do so.

Why not treat her as a wise creditor treats a delinquent debtor? A creditor with any brains doesn't demand immediate payment from a debtor and cause his bankruptcy. On the contrary, he studies his condition and does what he can to enable him to liquidate his indebtedness by paying in suitable installments. This is the only reasonable way to deal with Germany in this crisis of her affairs. Consolidate her indebtedness, covering every item of indebtedness for damage to the nations at war with her, and make the time of payment not less than 50 years, this indebtedness to be represented by coupon bonds of suitable denominations, with a semiannual rate of interest at a low rate (perhaps 3.65, for convenience), and an annual payment of 2 per cent on the principal until the whole debt is extinguished.

JAMES PHINNEY BAXTER.

I can not surmise what the commissioners at the peace table will decide in this regard, but I simply want to say that the good, sound sense, as I view it, expressed in this letter from Mr. Baxter appeals to me.

But, Mr. President, whatever the amount or whatever the terms, it will be better for the allies, better for the peace and prosperity of the world, better for Germany herself, that it be determined quickly.

The papers of a few days ago carried the message of Mr. Hoover to the effect that the Huns had laid northern France prostrate; that industrial life had been paralyzed; that 1,500,000 persons needed relief; that the French Government would be powerless to afford relief for months to come. And there is Belgium besides—worse off than northern France—industrially ruined. Workmen and workwomen killed, plants and machinery destroyed or stolen, taken, and carried away, with the hope, as expressed in a resolution of the Cologne Chamber of Commerce, that "the destruction of French and Belgian industries would allow a rapid recovery of German power." What can we hope from a nation with a spirit like that? Or let me qualify—as long as she maintains a spirit like that—so as to not exclude a hope of regeneration.

But note a contrast. There was a strong desire to repay the Huns somewhat in kind, to give them a taste of their own frightfulness by destroying some of their industries, by laying low a few of their cities, and there was to be heard the demand, "On to Berlin!"

But the desire to end the bloodshed silenced these voices, and not a German industry nor a German home was touched by the devastating hand of war. The contrast is finely depicted by a double cartoon in the Columbus Dispatch. Here it is in a recent number of the Literary Digest: Scene 1, what the German soldier goes home to: A snug and pleasant looking cottage, good outbuildings, neat fence, all in good repair, wife and children with hands extended giving the approaching man in uniform, with gun and knapsack on his back, glad welcome out at the gate.

Scene 2, what the Belgian soldier goes home to: A picture of desolation complete. Only the trunks or stumps of trees, outbuildings blown to pieces; what must have been a comfortable home now a ruin, part of one end and the chimney all that is left standing. And in the midst stands the returned Belgian soldier—no wife or child greets him, and the only sign that they once had been there is the broken child's doll he finds in the scattered débris.

Here, Mr. President, are wrongs for which no complete reparation can ever be made. Let Germany pay till she is bled white, she can never heal the deep anguish she has caused by her savage methods of warfare. But justice demands that she atone for the wrong in the one way the world recognizes as adapted to the case—by compensation in money.

Our distinguished ex-President, Mr. Taft—a most devoted advocate of a league of nations to enforce peace—speaks of such a league as an "acute necessity." I believe I have already shown there is no present necessity, if ever, and I am satisfied that the people of the United States will say that not a league of nations but the relief and restoration and rehabilitation of Belgium and northern France, not to speak of Serbia, constitute the "acute necessity" and the supreme duty of the hour. The duty is not performed until Germany's contribution is determined and the guaranties for its payment made certain.

We all rejoice in the splendid reception given the President in France and England and Italy; the people acclaim and royalty entertains and exhibits its best; his visits in these countries have been a continuous ovation. May we not flatter ourselves that the high honors bestowed are in part due to the great and generous people he represents? But I confess to some regret that nowhere have we seen mention of any discussion of the prospective claims for the unspeakable wrongs suffered by the unoffending civilian populations of Belgium and France.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. If I understand the full significance of the Senator's statement, it is to the effect that the President has not given utterance to statements that would call for reparation in behalf of France and Belgium?

Mr. STERLING. Oh, no; I do not mean to say that the President has not expressed himself even before going abroad; I hardly know what he has stated abroad in regard to this particular subject; but before going abroad the President expressed himself—and I believe that that is his firm conviction—to the effect that there should be reparation for those wrongs.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I desire to say that upon one occasion at least, and, as I recall, upon two occasions, since the President has been in Europe, and in one very notable speech, the President explicitly declared that reparation must be made to Belgium and to France and to their people.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KING. And I have no doubt that the Senator from South Dakota and the American people will be entirely satisfied with the attitude of President Wilson upon this matter. President Wilson will make no soft peace; there will be a just one made. Germany will be compelled to meet all just and righteous exactions for the atrocities and wrongs she has committed.

Mr. STERLING. I do not disagree for a moment with the Senator from Utah in the expression of his belief as to the President's attitude or as to what the President has said, Mr. President. My complaint is that these items of expense, damage, and devastation are not being specifically considered, and considered now.

How infinitely better it seems, too, if subjects like these and others growing immediately out of the war should have first place rather than the ill-defined and yet 300-year old dream of a league of nations to enforce peace. Would not the enforcement of the terms of a just peace quickly made be the best guaranty of continued peace, and take the place of a league of nations for some time to come? It should be a peace so just that Germany would be unwilling, if not powerless, to break it, or to break the peace of nations for a generation to come at least.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I know the distinguished Senator from South Dakota is so fair and so just that he would not want even an inference to be drawn from any remarks of his that would be the basis of an injustice to President Wilson or to any other person. I therefore now invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that the newspapers have been replete with evidences of the fact that upon numerous occasions the President has taken up with Lloyd George, Balfour, Clemenceau, and the representatives of Italy and France other questions than the question of the league of nations. Obviously, neither the utterances of the President nor of those with whom he has talked upon those important questions such as indemnity, rectification of territorial lines, would be for the public at present. They are, in diplomatic language, mere "conversations"; but, of course, the matter that the President has most addressed himself to in his public speeches has been the league of nations. However, I do not think it is quite fair to infer because he has spoken repeatedly concerning a partnership, or concert, or a league of nations that the other questions to which the Senator is now alluding have not received consideration.

Mr. STERLING. I do not mean, Mr. President, that any such inference should be drawn from what I am saying. I am saying, however, that it is my position that the other questions should have first place rather than that the time should be consumed in preliminary conferences or in the actual peace conference itself in discussing the question of a league of nations to enforce peace.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MOSES. It is very evident, Mr. President, that a discussion of this kind will produce various effects upon the minds of the large audience listening to it. I understood the Senator from South Dakota to mean that the President had been setting forth his demands for a league of nations as preliminary to all other discussions and all other elements in the discussion of the peace treaty. It is my understanding, from a pretty careful reading of the telegrams and dispatches that come from Europe, that the President has been insisting that the league of nations should precede all other elements and discussions in the peace treaty and that all of his speeches and all of his efforts have been directed toward that end.

I do not understand that the Senator from South Dakota takes a different point of view, and certainly his remarks produced no such impression upon my mind. I hope the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has not been misled by the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota into thinking that his meaning has been otherwise.

Mr. STERLING. I thank the Senator for his observations. Mr. President, it must not be overlooked that disputes concerning territory and boundaries will be among the most serious and important to engage the attention of the peace conference. It is reported that there will be 26 of such disputes, some of which will be hotly contested. I quote from the cablegram of Paul Scott Mowrer found in the Evening Star of Tuesday.

I ask leave to print these various items as found in the Washington Evening Star instead of reading them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PROBLEMS BEFORE PEACE CONFERENCE—26 TERRITORIAL DISPUTES LISTED, SOME OF WHICH ARE HOTLY CONTESTED—CLAIMS OF THE NATIONS.

(By Paul Scott Mowrer.)

PARIS, FRANCE, January 5.

There are some 26 territorial disputes in Europe, not to mention those in Asia and Africa, which the peace conference will be called upon to settle. These disputes may be listed as follows:

1. The Aaland Islands, now held by Russia and apparently claimed by Sweden.
2. Helgoland, now held by Germany but probably claimed by England.
3. Denmark demands the return of Schleswig from the hands of the Germans.
4. Belgium seems to be preparing to demand from Holland the Province of Limburg, which stretches like a peninsula between Belgium and Germany, forming an awkward barrier.

LUXEMBURG'S ALTERNATIVE.

5. Luxemburg will be called upon to decide whether she prefers to be French, Belgian, or independent.
6. France desires to neutralize the left bank of the Rhine.
7. France wants to include the Sarre Basin in Lorraine.
8. Italy claims part of the Austrian Tyrol.
9. The Italians and Jugo-Slavs are engaged in a bitter controversy over the Dalmatian coast, which both claim; they are intrenching opposite one another where the lines meet north of Fiume.
10. Northern Albania is claimed by the Jugo-Slavs, the Valona region by Italy, and southern Albania by Greece, while the Albanians themselves desire independence.
11. Greece claims all of Thrace, including Constantinople, from Bulgaria and Turkey.
12. Greeks, Serbs, and Bulgars all demand favorable frontier rectifications in Macedonia.
13. The Jugo-Slavs seem to claim the strip running from Graz to the Danube east of Vienna so as to give them a common frontier with the Czecho-Slovaks.

BITTER PROTEST BY HUNGARIANS.

14. The Hungarians protest bitterly against the newly declared southeastern frontier of Slovakia.
15. The Poles, Czechs, and Germans all claim Silesia.
16. The annexation of the banat of Temesvar has been proclaimed by both the Jugo-Slavs and the Roumanians, while the Hungarians are unwilling to relinquish it.
17. The Roumanians occupying Transylvania are driving out the Hungarians.
18. Roumanians and Ruthenians are fighting over Bukovina.
19. The Bulgarians want a favorable frontier rectification in the Dobroges.
20. Roumanians are occupying Bessarabia, which the Ukrainians also claim.
21. The Poles and Ruthenians are fighting over eastern Galicia.
22. The Germans and Poles are fighting over Posen.

CLAIMS BY POLAND.

23. The Poles claim the valley of the Vistula and Danzig from Prussia.
24. The Poles claim east Prussia.
25. The Poles claim Lithuania, which seems to prefer independence.
26. Bolsheviki are invading the Baltic Provinces, which seem to desire independence.

Mr. STERLING. Thus it will be seen that a part of the work of the peace conference will consist of nation making. The nations thus to be constituted are those for whose peace their membership in a league of nations would be most desirable, but let us have first the nation capable in the exercise of sovereign power to enter a league; and let us remember that this work of making new nations and establishing their frontiers is distinctly the work of the peace conference.

The advocates of a league of nations speak confidently and as though it were an easy thing to achieve. Agree to it and it is done. Or at most, since the representatives of different nations are presently to assemble in a peace conference, made necessary by the armistice and the end of the war, together with the admission of defeat, why should not these same representatives at the same conference prepare and adopt a constitution for, and forthwith organize, a league to enforce peace?

I have already mentioned some of the problems to be solved, the difficulties to be encountered. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] a few days ago read into the RECORD many more suggested by Lord Bryce, an earnest and most distinguished advocate of such a league. No candid man at all acquainted with the action of the usual deliberative body, let alone a body composed of such diverse elements as an assembly for the purpose of creating a league of nations, and who has any conception of the momentous issues and world interests involved in the formation of such a league and the conferment of the power upon it to enforce peace, can doubt that many months, more probably years, would elapse before a congress assembled for the special purpose had concluded its labors and published the results to the world.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The distinguished Senator from South Dakota has invited attention to the momentous questions that demand solution at the peace conference. Among the questions to which he has referred are those involved in the reorganization of governments and, as he said, the setting up of new nations. The question occurs to me—and I suggest it to the Senator, in view of the implied criticism, at least, of the action of President Wilson—does not the Senator think, where changes are being made that will in a measure rearrange the map of Europe and steps must be taken that call for more or less of protection and support for new nations which may be recognized, that before the American delegates enter formally the peace conference there should be some understanding as to what shall be done by the allied nations for the purpose of perpetuating the work which they do? Might it not be a futile and unwise thing to settle boundaries, erect new states, impose indemnities, and agree upon the multitudinous questions involved in the settlement of the mighty issues and results of this war, and then leave the conference without reaching an understanding looking to the preservation of the work accomplished and the maintenance, at least for a time, of the status quo created? Therefore, would not a prudent and a wise man representing a great nation want to have some information in advance as to what would be done toward preserving the structure to be erected? The form of the peace treaty may depend upon what terms it contains to protect the peace of the world.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I shall give some little hint of my view on that question before I close. But the attitude of the allied nations toward the new nations to be created or carved out of enemy territory or other territory will be such as in itself will give an assurance of peace to these new nations, an assurance that none of them shall be made the prey of any other aggrandizing nation or of nations desirous of annexing any part of their territory or in any way invading their rights.

But for the settlement of the many problems which must come before a congress to form a league of nations the manifold issues of the war can not wait without imperiling the existing peace.

On what principle does the right to form a league for the enforcement of peace rest? Its advocates claim to find it in the right of the State to maintain order and protect society by enacting a penal code with its provisions for the punishment of any person convicted of violating it.

But it seems to me that the cases are quite different. A sovereign State is not for the purposes of the league like the individual citizen of a State who in order that the State may exist without anarchy must conform to the law. The State stands for a whole people. How can a State as the organ through which the people speak and act politically give valid consent to the coercion of its own people any more than a State or any supposed State authority can surrender the police power of the State? The violation of any treaty may subject the nation at fault to hostile attack, but that is altogether different from consent in advance that the nation aggrieved either singly or in combination with other nations may resort to arms against her.

Again, Mr. President, it has been gravely contended that there is identity of principle or at least an analogy in our Federal form of government and a league of nations to enforce peace. But this claim will not stand analysis. The whole question appears to have been thoroughly considered by the Convention of 1787. The plan of a constitution laid before the convention by Randolph of Virginia contained a provision authorizing the Congress or national legislature "to call forth the force of the Union against any member of the Union failing to fulfill its duty under the articles thereof." The Patterson, or New Jersey, plan contained a similar provision. Mr. Madison was at first in favor of such a provision, but later changed his mind and observed that "the more he reflected on the use of force, the more he doubted the practicability, the justice, and efficacy of it when applied to a people collectively and not individually—a union of the States containing such an ingredient seemed to provide for its own destruction," and note this significant statement of Mr. Madison:

> The use of force against a State would look more like a declaration of war than an infliction of punishment and would probably be considered by the party attacked as a dissolution of all previous compacts by which it might be bound.

Hamilton, as we know, believed in a strong central government and submitted to the convention a plan accordingly. But he was opposed to armed force as a means of coercing a State. He spoke of force as either a coercion of laws or a coercion of arms. "But how," he asked, "can this force be exerted on the States collectively? It is impossible. It amounts to war between the parties. Foreign powers also will not be idle spectators. They will interpose, the confusion will increase, and a dissolution of the Union ensue." The same position was restated with great force in the Federalist.

Oliver Ellsworth, like Hamilton, distinguished between coercion of law and coercion of arms. "Where," he asks, "will those who oppose a coercion of law come out? Where will they end? A necessary consequence of their principle is a war of the States one against another. I am for coercion by law, that coercion which acts only upon delinquent individuals. This Constitution does not attempt to coerce sovereign bodies—States—in their political capacity. No coercion is applicable to such bodies but that of an armed force. If we should attempt to execute the laws of the Union by sending an armed force against a delinquent State it would involve the good and the bad, the innocent and the guilty, in the same calamity."

And so, Mr. President, this is the foundation on which we have builded—coercion of law and not coercion of arms. Our great Civil War even did not illustrate a contrary principle. It was not the war of the Federal Government against individual States, but a war to enforce the execution of the laws of the United States against those in armed rebellion against the Government of the United States and its authority.

If in forming a nation composed of so-called sovereign States, but inevitably less than sovereign as members of the Union of States, it was found necessary to reject the doctrine of coercion by force of arms, how can we expect to see that doctrine successfully applied to States which are in fact now and which always expect to remain sovereign and independent States?

Others may see no difficulty in the way; but either there is this one mighty obstacle in the way of a league, the ultimate sanctions of which rest on force, or else I am sadly wanting in faith or vision or both.

Mr. President, the Nation now mourns the death of one of its greatest citizens, if not at the time the greatest. Thorough, faithful, and eminently able in all the many positions he occupied during his strenuous life, from his membership in the New York Legislature to seven and a half years as President of the United States, he is famed and honored to-day for the great and beneficent results he accomplished in each.

One of his biographers, in speaking of Col. Roosevelt's sense of duty, says:

> Mr. Roosevelt's conception of duty ignores all sorts of magnificent ideals at long range and fastens itself upon the tasks which lie nearest his hand.

The lesson afforded by his conception of duty is one for us to heed. The task has been at hand and waiting now since the great and fateful day when the armistice was signed. Its terms, together with the unsettled conditions at present existing, would seem to make the consideration of the terms of peace and of readjustment alone the practical, the imperative, duty of the hour.

For the rest we should be willing now to trust to the moral and political sympathies and kinship of the allied nations, to their example, to their kindly offices and admonitions in international disputes or when war threatens. Their influence, together with the common aversion to war intensified as it is by what the world has just passed through, ought, aside from the internal dissensions of any nation, to be the harbinger and guaranty of a long peace between nations; and so we come back to the thought that good will and good faith between nations, and not force, are our only sure guaranties of international peace.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, I will take this occasion to express some views which I hold about the proposition of a world league of nations for the preservation of peace, and some matters incidentally connected therewith, such as the approaching peace conference between the warring nations. For some time I have had running through my mind some random thoughts on these subjects which have crystallized into sentiments with me, and I beg leave to take this occasion to express those sentiments.

I believe it is not only the privilege but the duty of Senators to express their sentiments, if they have any, on these great questions of vital importance which are now attracting the thought not only of the people of this country but of the entire world. Senators are supposed, in some measure at least, to know and represent the sentiments of their constituents, and I believe they generally do. I believe when they have sentiments on such subjects as these they should express them for the consideration of those who have the immediate handling and disposition of the issues involved, if such persons should see fit to give them any consideration; and if so, for such and so much consideration as those more immediately concerned in handling these problems may think such sentiments to be worthy of.

Under certain conditions and within certain restrictions and limitations of membership, jurisdiction, and other details I am in favor of a world league of nations for the preservation of peace. I would not favor, however, any league of nations which would diminish the sovereignty of the United States of America. I do not believe that any league of nations which may be formed ought to require any reduction of the British Navy, which has been probably the greatest factor in redeeming the world from the destruction which threatened it during the last four years, and which I am sure will be used as a preservative of the future peace, honor, and integrity of civilized nations which want to do what is right in international affairs.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. With much pleasure.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator is like all of us who approach the discussion of this problem of a league of peace, in that he is compelled to discuss it somewhat negatively. Does the Senator know of anybody who has defined a league of nations—as to how it shall be composed and as to what authority it shall have or be clothed with?

We can all approach the question by saying that we are not in favor of a league of nations that will interfere with the Monroe doctrine, or a league of nations that will constitute a supersovereign to which we must yield a portion of our sovereignty, and all that sort of thing, in a negative way; but will the Senator define his league of nations so as to say to us how it shall be composed and with what authority it shall be clothed?

I should think that a discussion along that line would be exceedingly wholesome at this time.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has asked several questions. I will try to give attention to each of them.

As to the Senator's first question, whether I know of anybody who has defined a league of nations or said of what it should consist and how it should be conducted, I do not know of anyone who has completely given such a definition in its entirety. I have heard various theories advanced, but all of them appear to be more or less nebulous and chaotic. I think the subject is one which will require very prolonged and exceedingly careful consideration, not only by the people who frame the proposition for the league of nations but by those who are called upon to ratify it.

As to my views, I admit that they are not entirely mature as yet. They are somewhat in the same condition as the views of most people; but I will try to give something of my views, as a part of my remarks, before closing.

As to the Monroe doctrine, of which the Senator from Indiana has just made mention, I would not favor any league of nations which did not retain in the United States complete jurisdiction over the Monroe doctrine. I would not be in favor of sharing that jurisdiction with any other nation or nations. I think the United States should also retain complete jurisdiction of immigration and such other questions as vitally affect our national existency and integrity.

I do not think that Germany or any other of the central powers should be admitted now, or within this generation, into any league of nations that might be formed. Like most of the others who have discussed this subject I can tell more about what I think ought not to be done than what should be done; and perhaps I am in the same situation in that respect as most of the others who have given the subject attention.

As I have stated, under certain conditions I would favor a league of nations; but I do not look with favor upon the plan, sometimes suggested, of the delegates to the peace conference, which is soon to assemble, undertaking to frame an agreement for a league of nations and to incorporate it in and make it a part of a treaty of peace between the warring nations. I can see no reason why the two should be combined in one transaction. I believe it would be better not, and I hope it will not be done. The two propositions are distinct. They are not inseparably connected. They possess many elements of difference which will require different theories and extended consideration in different directions; and I can see no necessity that the two be treated as parts of one transaction at one sitting of one and the same body.

I think many advantages would inhere in a contrary course. I believe the first consideration of the approaching peace conference should be to frame terms of peace between the warring nations, and to take measures to enforce those terms of peace, and to put an end to the war that is now theoretically in existence, and as far as possible to put an end, as well, to the conflagration which has taken possession of nearly all of Europe. What the world needs and the people of this country want is peace first, right now. I believe the people of this country and the people of the world want peace as the first desideratum at the hands of our representatives in Europe. That is of more pressing importance than anything else. The people of this country want peace declared as soon as possible, and want demobilization, want as many of our boys as possible back, at the earliest possible day. Give them that first. Then see about a league of nations.

As I have said, I do not believe that Germany ought to be admitted to any league of nations; yet, when terms of peace are framed and completed, Germany will have to assent to those terms of peace, unless she wants to continue the war. We will have to have her, through her representatives, subscribe to them, and they will have to agree to submit them to whatever sort of government she may have for ratification; so that Germany will necessarily be a party to the conclusion of the treaty of peace. However, I do not think Germany ought to be permitted to have anything whatever to do with a world league of nations. She ought to be kept absolutely out of it; and yet, if an agreement for a league of nations is incorporated in the treaty of peace, which is to be submitted to all of the warring nations, Germany, it seems to me, would necessarily have to be admitted to the league of nations. She would have to be a party to it because she would have to assent to it; because she would have to subscribe to the document which provides for it; and why should we require Germany to subscribe to that arrangement unless she is going to be admitted to it and made a party to it? It would be radically wrong to require Germany to subscribe to something which she did not have to live up to and to which she was not a party; but if the two agreements are to be embodied in one document, if the league of nations is to be incorporated in the treaty of peace, Germany will undoubtedly have to sign the agreement for the league of nations as well as the agreement for the peace treaty. That I do not want to be. In other words, I want Germany to be compelled to assent to the peace treaty, whether she may want to or not; but I do not want to permit her to assent to or participate in the league of nations, even if she should desire to. Hence they should be kept separate and distinct and the peace treaty, first in importance and necessity, should come first.

For that reason alone, among a number of other reasons, I think that the consideration of the formation of a league of nations should be postponed until after the treaty of peace is arrived at and subscribed by the representatives of the warring nations. Then, if the peace delegates want to continue their existence and their sessions and sit in a different capacity and frame a proposal for a league of nations, while the United States Senate and the due and appropriate bodies of the other warring nations are considering the ratification of the treaty of peace which is submitted to them, I would have no objection to that. If they should desire to go from one piece of business to another, I can not see that there would be any material objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCUMBER in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Of course, it is understood that all of the European powers and practically all of the other powers that are in this war want something of this peace conference. England will be wanting territory. She will be wanting indemnities. France likewise will be wanting indemnities and territory, and so will each of the other great nations among the allies. They are not particularly interested in the thing in which America is interested. America is not asking for any indemnity or any territory.

Mr. MYERS. I think we ought to ask for indemnity, though.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, I know; but, as a matter of fact, we are not doing it.

Mr. MYERS. We are not, so far.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not so far. The only thing for which America is asking is freedom from future wars and freedom of the seas, so that our commerce can go and come at will. These are the principal things for which America is asking. Now, does not the Senator think that when the peace conference is over and these European nations have got all the territory that they can get and all the indemnities that they can get—in other words, when it has been decided that they should get all that they can get—they will leave the conference and have no further interest, really, in these questions that they may consider entirely idealistic questions? In that way America will be prevented from getting these vital things that will prevent wars in the future. Does not the Senator think that now, when these other nations that are going to be in the peace conference want something, is the time for America to get what she wants?

Mr. MYERS. I think that after the treaty of peace is concluded the nations which constitute the entente allies will want a league of nations to prevent a repetition of the horrible catastrophe that has just convulsed the world in fire and blood as much as the United States will want it. It is more to their interest to prevent it than it is to the interest of the United States to do so. They are more immediately subject to the danger of a recurrence. They would be the greatest sufferers if another world war should break out on the Continent of Europe, and I think they will want to prevent it just as much as the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that is true, why are some of the representatives of some of the nations opposing it now and why should anyone oppose it if we can get it now? If that is what we want, why not get it, and get it as soon as possible?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will yield while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Mr. MYERS. Replying to the esteemed Senator from Tennessee, I will say that I have not heard of any accredited representatives of any of the countries that constitute the entente allies being opposed to a league of nations along proper lines, to be worked out in the future. I was not aware that any of the nations which constitute the entente allies had taken that stand. I thought they were all open to conviction on the subject and that most of them had agreed that we ought to have some league of nations.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was called out of the Chamber for a moment, and I did not hear all the Senator said, but I judge from the remark I just heard that the Senator is not aware that any of the nations have taken a position opposed to a league of nations. That is true, but there are certain statesmen in each of the nations, I believe, who want to postpone it, just as there are certain gentlemen in our own Nation who want to postpone it. The question I ask is, If a league of nations is a good thing and we can get it now, why not take it now while we can get it?

Mr. MYERS. I have just given one reason which, to my mind, is very vital. I am opposed to admitting Germany into a league of nations, and yet if an agreement for a league of nations and an agreement as to terms of peace with Germany are both arrived at in one transaction, by one body, at one sitting, as a part of one transaction, and are embodied in one document. Germany would have to sign the agreement for a league of nations as well as the agreement for a treaty of peace. If the two agreements were to be embodied in one document, Germany, it seems to me, would inevitably have to be admitted to the league of nations, and I am utterly and absolutely opposed to that. She is not fit to be in a league of nations. I am not only opposed to permitting Germany to be in a league of nations but am opposed to letting her have anything to say about what nations may be in, or about the terms of it, or about anything else connected therewith. Let Germany sign and ratify the treaty of peace and no more.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator think that the allies, who will be absolutely in control of the conference, will permit Germany to come into any league or into any agreement, whether you call it a league or whatever you may call it, that will be inimical to any of the allies? I do not think so. I think that right now the terms upon which Germany may be admitted to sign any peace treaty, whether it includes a league of nations or not, will be more drastic and severe than they will be if it is postponed until some future time when feeling has abated.

Mr. MYERS. I am in favor of having a treaty of peace perfected and put in force just as soon as possible. One of my reasons is that the terms to Germany may be severe and just. When it is submitted to the various nations concerned in it for their consideration and ratification, if the same delegates which framed it wish to continue sitting, if it is their judgment that they should do so, and if they want to consider in a separate transaction the forming of a league of nations, I can see no objection to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is a lawyer, of course.

Mr. MYERS. I have the honor to belong to that profession.

Mr. McKELLAR. Both the Senator and I as lawyers have asked for a continuance in various cases for a defendant when the defendant had rather a bad case. The Senator is familiar with the doctrine among practitioners at the bar that one postponement is equal to about a halfway winning of the case, and two postponements are equal to about a three-fourths winning of the case. Now, is not the same principle involved here? If a league of nations is postponed at this time is it not true that those who would have no league of nations have about half won their case?

Mr. MYERS. I do not think so. Every case at a term of court can not be tried the first day or on the same day. I am not an advocate of combining in one trial the trial of two cases involving different issues and totally dissimilar subjects. I think the issues of one case should be tried on one day or at one time, and following that the issues of the other should be tried. If there were different parties to the two cases they would have to be tried separately. Here Germany would have to be a party to one settlement and should not be to the other. I do not believe in attempting to combine adjudication of two things having different subject matter and different parties.

Europe is afire with lawlessness and warring elements, some of which are trying to ignite the world and upset civilization. The sparks are flying everywhere. Some of them are lighting in this country and threatening ignition. They are embers of the great conflagration just ended. The first thing is to put out the fire and have peace. We must have peace before we can enforce it. If a man's house were afire, I should think his first care would be to put out the fire, and then that he would consider how to prevent another fire. If a man's house were afire I would not think he would spend any time talking about how to prevent another fire until he had first put out that fire. It seems to me that is exactly the situation in Europe to-day. First, I would say, put out the fire that is burning. Then take steps to prevent another. First stop the war that is smoldering and emitting sparks. Then take steps to prevent another. First get the most of our boys home. Then take steps to see that they do not have to go abroad again to keep brigand nations from throttling the world.

Furthermore, any treaty of peace between the warring nations and also any agreement for a league of nations, of course, must be submitted to the United States Senate for ratification, and there may be some Senators who would be for one proposition and against the other. I think they should have the privilege of considering, debating, and voting on them separately. That is my view of the matter. I may be wrong. I am open to conviction, but it now appears to me that would be the logical course to pursue.

The peace conference which is about to assemble will have urgent and arduous duties of immediate moment, of pressing necessity, which I think should receive very prompt attention. There will be enough to demand its attention for some time, exclusively, in arriving at terms of peace; and if the peace delegates should undertake to divide their time and efforts between the formation of a treaty of peace, which it seems to me ought to be perfected in a few weeks if given exclusive attention, and the vague and uncertain subject of a world league of nations, an experiment that never has been tried, they would undoubtedly sit for months, and might sit for years, before arriving at a conclusion as to either. Meantime, the world would with impatience await results.

A treaty of peace should be arrived at and agreed upon in a comparatively short time. To form a league of nations might take a year. It seems to me they should first undertake the simplest undertaking. Then let them consider deliberately and in all its details the untried experiment of a world league of nations and take for it all the time necessary.

Serious questions press now upon the peace delegates for speedy solution. One of the first that confronts them and the world is what to do with the German Kaiser. It should not go unanswered. Justice demands an answer. I think the German Kaiser should be executed. He should be put to death. He has forfeited the right to live. Death should be his portion. He should be executed like a common criminal. He is an uncommon criminal, but he should be executed just as though he were a very common criminal, and I think he should be executed without a trial. His guilt is known. There is nothing to try. What issues are there to try? All the world knows that he launched a vile, criminal war which plunged the world into the greatest catastrophe and conflagration which it has ever known, the greatest calamity since the flood; that he drenched Europe with blood and crime and bestiality; and that he waged war in a way which violated every principle of international law, civilized warfare, humanity, civilization, Christianity, and common decency. The world well knows those things. They are known to all men. They are common knowledge, sufficiently common for judicial cognizance. He waged war in a way which brought the blush of shame to everybody who has any respect for international rights, civilized warfare, or common decency; in a way that brought agony to hearts of women and palled the souls of men. He bombed hospitals and undefended towns; he murdered thousands of innocent women and children, mangled and maimed little school children at their desks, while pursuing the innocent pastimes of childhood; he cut the hands off of little boys, ravished women and girls, murdered thousands of noncombatants, and carried other thousands into captivity and slavery. These things are known to all the world, and what is there to try in regard to his guilt? He is a monster of iniquity, a fiend in human form. While others have been executed for murdering one human being, he has murdered thousands.

I am not in favor of any soft sentimentality in dealing with these awful questions which are pressing upon the attention of the world. I believe they should be weighed and determined from a standpoint of justice. I believe there is such a thing as justice in the immutable laws of God, and I think there ought to be in all the laws and transactions of mankind. If there is to be justice in the world, if any justice is to come out of the awful catastrophe which has deluged the world with blood, the German Kaiser, the arch criminal of all, should suffer death.

I think as a result of the treaty of peace, which I hope may soon be concluded, the German Government, whatever government may then be in charge of German affairs, should be required to surrender the Kaiser to the military authorities of the United States and the entente allies for execution; and if the German Government should refuse to do so, the armies of the United States and the entente allies should go wherever he may be found and take him and execute him. Every nation on earth ought to be made to know that no civilized nation can harbor such a criminal as the German Kaiser and give him an asylum of safety and refuge from punishment. There should be no nation that would want to do so, and if any nation wants to do it it should be disillusioned.

There are ample reasons for my conclusions on this subject. There is ample reason for holding the Kaiser responsible for all the monstrous criminality and shocking outrages of this horrible war. In 1914 postal cards were printed under the authority of the Kaiser and sent to the Kaiser's soldiers as a command from their commander in chief, which contained these printed instructions to German soldiers: "You will take no prisoners; you will show no mercy; you will give no quarter; you will make yourselves as terrible as the Huns under Attila." At the beginning of the war the Kaiser issued a proclamation to the German soldiers, speaking of all who dared oppose his will, in which he said: "Strike him dead. The day of judgment will not ask you for reasons." Those are the principles and injunctions upon which the Kaiser waged war.

There will be no punishment for fearful crimes and deadly wrong as long as he is permitted to live.

There are other reasons why he should be executed, and executed without a trial. If it were known to all the world that any ruler of a country who started a criminal and wicked war, in the event he lose the war, would lose also his head, there would be very few wars waged in future. If it were known to all the world that any ruler who started a war of aggression against another country would, in the event of losing the war, also lose his head, there would be mighty little war waged.

There has not been a bank failure in China for a thousand years, for the reason that at the time of their last bank failure the officials of the failed bank were beheaded. I think the execution of the Kaiser would have very much the same effect on future warfare in the world. It would be an example to others which would have a most beneficent effect in preventing war. I think it would be a better preventive of war than any league of nations that might be formed.

In addition to that, the Kaiser's immense fortune, which is estimated at $250,000,000. should be confiscated. He has forfeited all right to it. It should be confiscated and used to pay indemnities to the entente allies and to the United States for the horrible outrages that he has committed in waging this brutally uncivilized and fearful war. Von Bernstorff, von Papen, von Rintelen, Dernburg, and a lot of the other German "vons" who were active criminals and moving spirits in this wicked war and who resorted to crime without stint or hesitation to advance their nefarious schemes, should be imprisoned for life at hard labor. That should be their portion, and it should be so provided by the treaty of peace.

I read an article from an issue of the Chicago Journal of a few months ago:

THE POTSDAM CONFERENCE.

On July 5, 1914, a secret conference was held at Potsdam. It was presided over by the Kaiser. Besides this all-highest war lord, there were present:

The German crown prince.
Von Bethmann-Holweg, then chancellor.
Von Tirpitz.
Von Falkenhayn.
Von Stumm, head of the political department of the foreign office.
Archduke Frederick of Austria.
Count Berchtold, foreign secretary of Austria.
Count Tisza, prime minister of Hungary.
Conrad von Hoetzendorf, Austro-Hungarian chief of staff.

The question before this council was whether to make the murder of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand a week before the excuse for starting a general European war. The council discussed the matter, and decided for war.

So much we know, and entirely from Teutonic sources. The German ambassador at Constantinople never wearied of telling the American minister how completely this council settled everything. There may have been more persons present than those named, and there may have been some opposition to the course pursued. It does not matter. These nine men did the deciding, and there could not have been much demur to their program, for the whole conference was over in a few hours.

Nine men, five Germans and four Austro-Hungarians, meeting in secret and owing responsibility to no one, started a war which has gone round the world; a war which has slain nearly 9,000,000 men in battle, starved or otherwise murdered millions of noncombatants, particularly babies, devastated vast provinces, destroyed great cities, heaped up mountainous debts.

Nine men and 9,000,000 deaths, counting soldiers alone. A million skulls to each important man at that conference, and the whole 9,000,000 to the Kaiser, who is responsible for them all! Was such preeminence in murder ever dreamed of before?

These are some of the reasons why I say the German Kaiser should be executed and why all the other men mentioned in that article should be imprisoned at hard labor for the rest of their natural lives. If that were done, I believe it would have more effect in preventing future wars than any league of nations that might be formed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, does the Senator think the Kaiser ought to be hung or shot?

Mr. MYERS. I might say both. If the Kaiser were both hung and shot it would be none too much punishment for his deserts.

Von Bernstorff, who is mentioned in that article, is a burglar. He tried to climb in the back door of the United States and corrupt our Government and debase it with the most unprincipled and dastardly criminal machinations that have ever been known in the history of this country. He undertook to turn loose in this country a tide of corruption, disloyalty, and treason, which, I am sorry to say, went further and acquired more volume than I liked, but which fortunately was stemmed in time to prevent any serious disaster to us as a Nation. He is one of those who should be imprisoned, according to my idea, at hard labor for the rest of his life.

In addition, I believe that Germany should be made to pay indemnity to every country constituting the entente allies and to the United States as well. I believe that Germany should be made to pay all the costs of this war to the nations which successfully waged it. I believe Germany ought to be required, as the result of the peace conference which is about to assemble, to pay every dollar of the $25,000,000,000 or more that the war cost this country; she ought to be required to reimburse us for every dollar of our war expenditure, and to do the same for Great Britain, France, Belgium, Italy, and every other country which participated in the war against her.

Is there any reason why the taxpayers of this country should pay the enormous sum of money which the war cost us? Did they bring on this war? Did they do anything wrong in connection with it? Is it their fault that this country entered the war and was compelled to use its entire military and naval forces and an unprecedented amount of money in order to throttle Germany and to keep her from destroying the world? What have the people of this country done that they should be mulcted in such an enormous sum—that such an enormous burden of taxation should be placed upon them? They have done nothing to deserve it. The German people are the people who made the entrance of this country into the war a necessity. They are the ones who are to blame. They are the ones who are in the wrong and they should be made to pay the penalty. I believe in applying to this situation the homely old maxim, "Let those who dance pay the fiddler." Germany danced to the music of war, to the dreams of the Kaiser for world conquest and his ambition to subdue all the world. Then, if Germany enjoyed the dancing let her pay the fiddler, I say; pay it all, every cent of it. You may rest assured that if Germany had won the war the United States would have been compelled to pay her a large, fat indemnity.

A provision in the treaty of peace to require Germany to reimburse us for our war costs would be nothing more than just and right. It would be absolute justice, and this world can not be satisfactorily conducted upon any other plane than that of justice. I believe justice is one of the greatest things in the world. If justice is not to prevail in this world the world can not be safe for democracy or safe for any other virtue that goes to make it a fit place in which to live. Justice should be the first consideration. We should be just before we are generous.

I do not partake of any of the sentimentality which favors dealing gently and softly with Germany and waiving all indemnity on behalf of this country. This country did not suffer as much as some of the other warring countries, but it suffered a great deal more than it should have been required to suffer, and Germany ought to pay the cost of it. I say, let those who caused the war pay the bills. It would have a very helpful effect upon the German people in deterring them from ever starting out again to conquer the world. It is a commonly accepted rule of practice and procedure at law, I believe, in all jurisdictions where disputes are adjudicated by law, that the winning party is entitled to recover his costs, that the losing party to litigation is required to pay the costs of both sides to the controversy, and the fact that it may bankrupt him to do so is not taken into consideration in the rendition of the judgment. The judgment is entered against him anyway, and if he is never able to pay it he always remains under the burden of it. I say let the judgment in this case be entered against Germany, and if she is never able to pay it let it hang over her for all time to come, as a warning that she must not try the same thing any more.

I think it would be a very efficient preventive of war, too, if it were known to all the world that hereafter any nation which embarked upon war, if it lost the war, would have to pay all costs; not only its own cost, but the cost of the prevailing nation or nations. I think that is a sound principle of law and justice. I think it has much effect upon some people in keeping them from going to law upon frivolous or unjustifiable grounds. Often they are kept from it by the fact that the litigation may be expensive and they may have to pay all the cost if they lose the litigation. I think it keeps many evilly disposed people out of court, and it would undoubtedly have the same effect upon the nations of the world if they knew full well that a losing nation at war would have to pay all the costs for both sides. Nations would be likely to consider a long time before engaging in an unjustifiable war. People would have to be very strongly convinced that war would be justifiable before they would engage in it under such circumstances.

There is another thing for which I think the peace conference should provide in the peace treaty, and that is requirement that Germany must repudiate her entire war debt. That war debt is a monument to the monstrous iniquities, the greed, the criminality, and the lustfulness for conquest of the German people. It was subscribed gleefully and joyously, with a view of reaping the benefits expected to ensue therefrom. The people of Germany were told, if they would support their Government and subscribe the necessary funds for the prosecution of the war, that when Germany had conquered her opponents and was ready to look forward to conquering the rest of the world they would be richly reimbursed in the booty of conquest, trade, and commerce, and loot for all the expenses which the war had cost them. The people subscribed to the German war fund, knowing that the war was a wicked, unjust, criminal war of conquest and aggression; and, having so subscribed, they should stand the just penalty of losing their money, put up for wicked purposes. I believe that, too, would be a good warning to the nations of the world. If they were made to know that a nation which engages in a wicked, unjustifiable war of conquest, if it loses, will be required to repudiate its war debt, I think it would have a very strong effect in keeping people from subscribing the funds with which to carry on such a war. A nation would be very careful, I believe, in future to decide whether or not a war was a righteous one before calling on its people for funds for waging war. In this instance, repudiation of Germany's war debt would be a just punishment. It would be merited.

The people of Germany who subscribed to the funds for the prosecution of the war were just as much in favor of a war of criminal aggression and lustful conquest as was the German Kaiser or as were any of the German war lords who conducted the infamous war. There was no difference. The people furnished the funds and the Kaiser and his war lords conducted the war and expended the funds, and they should all lose alike. If the German Government be allowed in the years to come to build up its fortunes and to repay its people the money they subscribed for the conduct of a wicked, criminal war, instead of paying the money to the entente allies and the United States by way of indemnity, it will be a monstrous miscarriage of justice, in my opinion. It should not be permitted. I say, make the criminals who fought pay, and make the criminals who paid lose.

Every war bond which the German Government issued to a subscriber of money for the purpose of carrying on the war should be repudiated, as a result of the treaty of peace; and if there are any holders of those war bonds in this country, it would give me peculiar pleasure and especial satisfaction to see repudiated the part of the debt which they hold and which is due them. I agree entirely with the sentiment so often expressed by the lamented late Col. Roosevelt, that people who in this country styled themselves German-Americans were not Americans at all, that their hearts were in Germany, and that they ought to be there themselves; and if their pocketbooks were at the disposal of Germany, they ought to be made to feel in a substantial way their lack of allegiance to this country.

I believe that all the property of the banks, the private holdings and the fortunes of Germany should be confiscated and applied to the payment of indemnities to the countries which compose the entente allies and to the United States. Every visible asset and all means which can be obtained to satisfy these just claims for indemnity should be applied thereto. I believe that Germany's iron and coal beds and her potash beds should be taken away from her, or that she should be required to work them for the payment of indemnities to the entente allies and the United States. I believe that the entente allies and the United States should keep all of Germany's warships and put them to use, and not sink them. I am not in favor of any such sentimentality as would sink those warships, when they are badly needed and can be put to some use for the benefit of the nations who are entitled to them. I believe that we should take all of Germany's merchant ships and distribute them among the entente allies and the United States. I believe that the successful countries should keep Germany's African colonies and that they should either be turned over to Great Britain in payment of her indemnity or should be distributed among the different nations which constitute the entente allies.

If necessary to make Germany pay for this war, I would have the German people work for their board and clothes for the next 500 years, and during that time, at least, they would not start another war of lustful bestiality, of wicked conquest, to destroy everything that does not worship at the shrine of German might.

I believe that the different states which constitute the German Empire should be forcibly and permanently segregated. I believe the peace conference should require the segregation of Prussia, Bavaria, and all other of the different principalities which compose the German Empire, and that it should be a provision of the treaty of peace that they should never again be united under one government, but must remain totally separate and apart forever. They should not be permitted to have a common ruler; they should not be permitted to have a common court nor a common legislative body, but should be kept just as separate and distinct as the United States and Canada are kept; just as separate and distinct as are Spain and Portugal.

Really Germany deserves dismemberment; that is, she deserves to be dismembered and to be partitioned and distributed as colonies amongst the entente allies, just as Poland was dismembered and partitioned some generations ago. That was a most monstrous and unjust act, to which Germany, to her shame and infamy, was a party. The dismemberment and partition of Germany would be a most merited and deserved act. I would not, however, go that far. I believe if the principalities which constitute the German Empire are forcibly segregated and kept apart and are allowed no cooperation whatever in the future, so long as time may last, that that would answer practical purposes fairly well.

These different principalities or States should be required, I think, by the treaty of peace to keep down their standing armies and reserve military forces to a very nominal number of men. Neither Germany, collectively, nor the principalities which compose Germany, separately, should be allowed ever again to maintain a standing army or a reserve force for military purposes which would be of any consequence. I would say that, merely for police purposes, I think each one of those principalities, as a separate nation, might be allowed to keep 500 or 1,000 men under arms or in reserve, but no more than that number. None of them should ever be allowed to have a navy.

The payment of the indemnities which I think should be paid to the entente allies and the United States in reimbursement for the cost of this war should be equitably apportioned among the different principalities which now compose the German Empire, and which, in future, ought to be separate and independent nations, and each one should be required to pay its allotted quota of the indemnities.

Germany should be required to quit warring on Poland. Poland should be erected into an independent nation, embracing original Polish territory. Germany should be required to quit helping the Russian Bolsheviki to conduct a reign of anarchy and crime in Russia. Germany, I believe, is furnishing much of the brains, power, munitions of war, and instruments to continue the unsettled and very disastrous state of affairs that prevails in Russia. Germany should be required to withdraw all aid and assistance, by troops, by intrigue, by connivance, by approval or recognition of any kind whatever, from any element of the people in Russia, and to let the Russian people settle their own troubles.

You may say that these terms are severe, but the subject matter of them merits severe terms; nothing but severity would be just. Stern measures should be taken in grave emergencies. I have read some utterances to the effect that we should not be animated by any spirit of revenge in our settlement with Germany. I agree with that; I do not think that we should be animated by revenge at all. We should be animated entirely by a spirit of justice; and in all that I say and advocate I have in view only justice, and am animated solely by a spirit of justice; but I believe justice should prevail. Organized society undertakes to punish individual criminals. It is absolutely necessary that it be done. That has been recognized for thousands of years. There can be no successful or beneficial organized society without the punishment of individual criminals. They are punished for the welfare of all, yet that punishment is not administered from a spirit of revenge; it is administered from a spirit of justice, or it should be, and I believe it generally is. When men prove themselves unfit to live as individuals in organized society, the common practice is to put them to death. When they prove themselves unfit to be at large, the common practice is to confine them for the rest of their lives, generally at hard labor. I believe the same rule should be carried into international affairs, so that when a nation like Germany proves itself unfit to be at large, as we might say, in the world of nations, she should be rendered absolutely impotent to do any more harm; she should be put in such a condition that she can do no more harm to the rest of organized society in the world. If you can not put her in some separate place and lock her up, she ought to be so fixed that she can never do any more harm to the organized society of the world. The only way to fix Germany so that she will never do any more harm to the organized society of the world is to strip her of all of her power, segregate her into different nations, require those nations to keep separate and refrain from reuniting, and make them pay the full measure of all the damage which the German Empire perpetrated on the world.

Of course, this would be a hardship upon the German people, but I am not one of those who believe that the German Kaiser and his war lords are entirely responsible for the horrible war that has just ended. In my opinion the German people were just as much to blame and were just as much the cause of it as were the German Kaiser and his war lords. The German Kaiser is the result of the spirit of the German people. The German people made the Kaiser what he is, and they are responsible for him. He is the outgrowth of their sentiments, their ideas, and their civilization. I believe the German people, as a rule, are every bit as bad as the German Kaiser, who is their product. I know there are some exceptions, but I am speaking of the German people generally. I do not believe the German people are the product of the German Kaiser; I do not believe that some 70,000,000 people, their animosities, their spirit, and their civilization are the product of one man. I believe that the one man is the product of the 70,000,000 people.

I do not believe that 70,000,000 people were dragooned and lassoed and dragged into this war. I believe they went into it willingly and cheerfully and eagerly and gleefully; that they were just as much in for a war of conquest, spoliation, aggression, and criminality as was the German Kaiser. In that connection I will read an extract from an article from the pen of Mr. Richard H. Edmonds, editor of the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, Md., which very forcibly expresses what would be just conditions for Germany as the result of her monstrous crimes. He says:

Until Heaven offers peace to unrepentant hell, until the Almighty invites Satan to a peace parley and to sit beside Him on the throne and rule the universe, we would be traitors to civilization and to God Himself to grant peace to an uncrushed, unrepentant, unpunished Germany. Peace for Germany without full punishment would be a premium upon crime and an indorsement of all Germany's fearful shedding of blood.

As to whether or not the terms I have proposed would be too severe for Germany or unmerited, I will read another article by the same author, Mr. Edmonds, which is entitled "The bill of civilization against Germany." It is as follows:

THE BILL OF CIVILIZATION AGAINST GERMANY!

What a staggering bill it will be!

It will be a bill for four years, up to the present time—how much longer no one yet knows—of the most fearful crimes which the world has ever known.

It will be a bill for the millions who have died in defense of civilization and for the millions who have been blinded and maimed and permanently invalided.

It will be a bill for all agonies which hundreds of millions have had to endure.

It will be a bill for the tears which have flowed from the eyes of millions of mothers and wives, sisters, and sweethearts because their loved ones have had to endure all of the hardships which the vilest ingenuity of hell could instigate as they fight on the side of heaven in the battle against hell.

It will be a bill for such sorrows as earth has never known by dishonored womanhood which in shame and deathless woe cries out to heaven against the criminals.

It will be a bill for mangled children and for tens of thousands of helpless babies done to death by Germany's crimes.

It will be a bill not merely for the tens of billions of money, not merely for the ships that have been murdered, for the towns and the countries that have been ravaged, for the cathedrals and churches that have been destroyed; these are only a part of the material things which must be charged against Germany in the bill of civilization against barbarism.

It will be a bill which no human words can ever portray and no auditor can ever state in figures.

These are some of the items in this bill against Germany, the magnitude of which no expert accountant who ever lived could measure by human calculations.

Though the tears can never be wiped away, the broken hearts never be mended, the millions of murdered brought back to life, the dishonored womanhood never be restored, the bill must be summed up in the most graphic language known to mankind. It must be written on the pages of human history with a pen fed by the blood of millions of broken, bleeding hearts. There it will stand forever as an unpaid debt from which Germany can never through eternity be cleansed.

As well might Judas have sought to blot out the reality of the betrayal of his Lord and of the agony of the cross as for Germany to hope ever to wipe out the record of its crimes. In letters of fire, burned into the soul of every man and woman living now or in the centuries to come, they will forever stand.

Germany will for 10,000 years be regarded as more typical of rotten heartedness than Judas and Nero.

Though Germany can never wipe out this bill, there is a bill for material things which should represent every dollar spent by America and our allies in saving civilization from being destroyed.

There is a bill for every ship that has been murdered, for every pound of foodstuffs and raw materials of which Germany has robbed others.

There is a bill for the disruption and disorganization of every business on earth.

There is a bill for every fruit tree cut down, for every town looted and burned, for every car and locomotive stolen. These things must be summed up and Germany be made to pay to the uttermost farthing.

To require anything less of Germany would be to condone its crimes, to become an apologist for them, and a coworker with Germany in sapping the world's moral strength.

There is also a bill which can be paid only by the death upon the gallows of the leading criminals.

I regret that this war did not terminate by an unconditional surrender of the forces of Germany and her allies. I regret that it did not terminate by military victory on German soil. I believe Germany should have been made to know and feel something of the devastation of war. I mean legitimate war, not criminal warfare. I would have had her taste war on her own soil. Of course, that is a thing of the past, and we can only look to the future. I believe, however, that justice demands adequate punishment of Germany for all of her crimes. The list is long and shocking and requires stern measures. For that reason I do not believe Germany should be admitted to the peace conference. She has no place in the peace conference; she is not entitled to have any voice in the peace conference; she is not fit to sit in the peace conference. Germany is a criminal; an international bandit, murderer, highwayman. Her crimes are black and shocking. She waged war by murder, rape, arson, and every other crime known to the catalogue of criminality. In my opinion the entente allies and the United States should formulate the terms which are to be imposed upon Germany, and should then call the German representatives into the conference and make them sign the terms. Germany is a criminal in the dock, awaiting her sentence, and should have no voice in what that sentence is to be. If she does not like this, let the result be extinction of Germany as a nation, annihilation of her national existence. If an earthquake were to occur and swallow up the entire territory now occupied by Germany and all the inhabitants thereof and a great lake were to succeed it, I believe the world would be better off. It would be safer, anyway.

I am not in favor of admitting Germany to any league of nations which may be formed. A league of nations is simply a law and order society. If a law and order society were formed in a community, who would think of admitting into it the most notorious criminals in the community? If the people of a community have been outraged and shocked beyond expression by a number of fearful and bloodcurdling criminal attacks and outrages upon the women of the community and a law and order society is organized to protect the women of the community, would anybody think of admitting into that law and order society a man who was guilty of the crime of rape, sit beside him at the table of the law and order society and confer with him about methods to prevent a repetition of such horrible crimes? If the crime of horse stealing has been prevalent in a community and a law and order society is organized to prevent horse stealing, would the people who organized that society take into it a notorious horse thief who had been repeatedly caught with the goods on him, caught stealing horses and making away with them? Would he be considered fit to sit in an antihorse thief society? Just so it is with Germany. Germany is not fit to sit in a league of nations; she is not a qualified party to sit in a league of nations; she would not be in sympathy with the nature and objects of a league of nations. If a society were organized to enforce a prohibition law, would people think of admitting into that society notorious bootleggers who make a business of surreptitiously selling whisky and defiantly breaking the very law which the society is organized to enforce? The question answers itself.

If Germany entered into a league of nations she would pay no attention to it; she would consider it merely "a scrap of paper." Germany has no honor or truth in her; she has no recognition of those principles which make for the maintenance of decency and honor and law-abiding conduct among nations. The very moment she became able to violate the principles of a league of nations, if a member, and saw it would be to her advantage to do so, she would violate them.

I lay down three general principles as the sum and substance of the views which I am expressing. They are, first, that Germany should be required to pay full indemnity for all the damage she has caused and the cost she has imposed in this war upon the United States and each and all of the nations of the entente allies; second, that Germany should not be admitted to the peace conference, because she is not fit to be admitted to it; and, third, that Germany should not be admitted to any league of nations, because she is not fit to be admitted to one. In support of them I will read some extracts from Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis's volume, entitled "German Atrocities." I wish to submit them, and ask if the people of whom these things are true are fit either to sit on a peace conference or to be represented in a league of nations, and if there would be any injustice in requiring them to pay in full all of the damages and costs they have brought upon the entente allies and the United States on account of this war? Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, as is doubtless well known to all Senators, is one of the prominent and leading clergymen of the United States. As clergyman, citizen, patriot and American, he stands in the forefront of our citizenry. He went to Europe during the progress of the European war and very carefully investigated the charges of German atrocities and had them fully verified to his entire satisfaction by affidavits, by the testimony of eyewitnesses, by official documents, by diaries taken from the bodies of dead German soldiers, and by other evidence that would be admitted in any court of law.

I have read for my own information a great deal of his book, and I will read to the Senate some striking excerpts therefrom:

No horrors in history are so overwhelmingly evidenced as the German atrocities. The nature, the number, and the extent of their crimes have been documented more thoroughly than the scalpings of settlers by Sioux Indians, the horrors of the Black Hole of Calcutta, or the cruelties of the Spanish Inquisition. No American to-day can cross the threshold of Belgium or northern France, Poland, or Serbia without recalling the words that Dante saw above the gate of hell, "Abandon hope, all ye who enter here." Not since Judas and his fellow conspirators crucified Jesus has there been a ruler, a war staff, or an army that has deliberately revived the cross as an instrument of torture to further the ends of military efficiency. The Germans have literally fulfilled the Kaiser's charge in 1899 and reproduced in 1914 upon various cards for the Kaiser's soldiers: "You will take no prisoners; you will show no mercy; you will give no quarter; you will make yourselves as terrible as the Huns under Attila." All scholars know that the Kaiser was referring to Attila's well-known motto, "Where my feet fall let grass not grow for a hundred years."

It is not by chance that the first atrocities were begun on practically the same day—August 17, of 1914—and along a line extending from the English Channel to the Swiss frontier, just as the murders and mutilations, the rapes, and the pillaging began and ended at the same time in Poland, Roumania, and Serbia, and are now being repeated in more malignant forms in northeastern Italy.

Nor were these atrocities committed in moods of drunkenness, hours of anger, nor by the occasional degenerate, like Jack the Ripper, of Whitechapel Road. Allen White and Arnold Toynbee are doubtless right in asserting that most of the attacks upon little girls and young women were made by German officers; nevertheless, all must confess that the German soldiers were not less culpable, as they pillaged the land guided by the deliberate, cold, precise, scientific, ordered policy of German frightfulness.

The story of German occupancy of Belgium and France is a long, black story of unspeakable crimes. These brigands broke into banks, looted factories, pillaged houses, burned the farmers' machinery, chopped down orchards and vineyards. In the face of their newly signed treaties with the allied nations, pledging the safeguarding of all buildings dedicated to education and religion, with the lives and property of noncombatants, the Germans made their treaties mere scraps of paper, sneered at the most solemn obligations given by men to men, burned cathedrals, colleges, and libraries, mutilated old men and women, violated little children, nailed a child to a farmer's barn door upon which they found a calfskin drying in the sun, and beneath wrote the word "zwei." They crucified Canadian officers and Roman Catholic nuns. They bombed hospitals and Red Cross buildings. They thrust women and little children between themselves and the Belgian and French soldiers defending their native land. The affidavits, photographs, and mutilated bodies are witnesses that destroy forever the last shred of doubt and incredulity. For men who are open to testimony, the German atrocities are more surely established than any of the hideous cruelties recorded in history. Now, for the first time, wildest savagery has been reduced to a science and damned into existence under the name of German efficiency.

In the "summarizing report by the general war staff," published December 31, 1914, the German chief says in explanation of the Belgian campaign: "The need of the German Army to push through Belgium was imperative. Our starting point was that the tactical object of the Twelfth Corps was to cross the Meuse with speed. To at once overcome the opposition of the inhabitants was a military necessity, and something to be striven for in every way." And what does "every way" mean? Let the German staff themselves answer. "The flourishing town of Dinant with its suburbs was burnt and made a heap of ruins and a large number of Belgian lives lost." "About 220 inhabitants were then shot and the village was burned. Just now—6 o'clock in the afternoon—the crossing of the Meuse begins near Dinant; all the suburbs, chateaux, and houses were burned down during this night. It was a beautiful sight to see the villages burning all around us in the distance." "The town appeared to be perfectly peaceful, nevertheless, for the sake of security, a number of the inhabitants were made prisoners by the grenadiers." "Later, we decided to assemble all the male hostages against the garden wall, where we shot them."

Hundreds of witnesses called in one town, after the Germans had passed on, show that the German officers and soldiers were engaged in one horrible orgy of pillage, drunkenness, lust, and murder.

They began by breaking open all wine cellars, and soon the officers went reeling and staggering through the streets, firing their revolvers into the windows of houses and stores. They blasted the safes open with dynamite. They carried goods from the shelves to the freight trains, and as fast as the town was pillaged burned the houses. During four days they looted and burned 1,200 houses, stores, factories, schools, and churches. They left lying on the ground 700 dead bodies, chiefly women and children. Two trains laden with the men and women who were strong enough to work were carried off to Germany. All the manufactories where the artisan class were wont to work were systematically destroyed. Marching away from towns that were blazing furnaces, the German soldiers drove in advance a long line of women and children, with a few aged men, and used them as screens behind which they could march into the next town that was to be looted.

I will now read what Cardinal Mercier, the primate of Belgium, declares about the ruin and sacking of Louvain:

At Louvain the third part of the city has been destroyed; 1,074 dwellings have disappeared; in addition, in the suburbs—Kesselloo, Herent, and Herberle—1,828 houses have been burned. In this dear city of Louvain, ever in my thoughts, the magnificent church of St. Peter will never recover its former splendor. The ancient college of St. Ives; the art schools; the commercial and consular schools of the University; the old markets; our rich library, with its collections, its unique and unpublished manuscripts, its archives, its gallery of great portraits of illustrious rectors, chancellors, professors, dating from the time of its foundation, which preserved for masters and students alike a noble tradition and were an incitement to good work—all this accumulation of intellectual, historic, and artistic richness, the fruit of the labors of five centuries, all, all is in ashes.

I read now words of admonition of the Kaiser and the German war staff to the German soldiers:

"Strike him dead; the day of judgment will not ask you for reasons." The soldier might read this: "You can slay, pillage, loot, burn, rape, leave thousands of bodies massacred and mutilated on the ground, but remember that your Kaiser and your war staff will stand between you and the avenging God, and will see to it that the Judge of all the earth makes you no trouble on the great day of accounting."

Here is the diary of Eitel Anders. It is believed that he belonged to the Fourteenth Bavarian Regiment. The diary was taken from his body upon the battle field and is similar to hundreds of others: "We crossed the bridge over the Maas at 11.50 in the morning. We then arrived at the town of Waendre. When we went out of the town everything was in ruins. In one house a whole collection of weapons was found (the mayor had ordered the women to bring to his house every weapon that they could find, that the Germans might have no excuse for saying that anyone had struck their soldiers or fired a gun). All the inhabitants, without exception, were brought out and shot. This shooting was heartbreaking as they all knelt down and prayed, but praying is no ground for mercy. A few shots rang out, and they fell back into the green grass and slept forever. It is real sport." But how did Eitel Anders sleep that night? We know that Macbeth did not sleep after he murdered Duncan and Banquo. The next day the soldier made another entry—mark the opening words: "This morning, in happy mood and high spirits, we passed through Taturages. But before this we cleaned up the suburb of Mons and burned the houses. The inhabitants came out of the houses into the open plain. Here many heartbreaking scenes occurred. It was really terrible to watch."

Having stated that he had murdered men, young Eitel Anders sleeps well at night, and the "next morning, in happy mood and high spirits," wakened to plan fresh crimes. Shakespeare's murderer did not dare trust himself out under the stars that blazed with anger, but Eitel Anders's sleep was not disturbed by the blood upon his hands, because he really believed the Kaiser would be able to stand between him and the great day of judgment.

After Gen. Clauss shot 15 aged men in the streets of Gerberviller, too, that officer rode away with a light heart, quite free from the remorse that unseated the reason of Macbeth.

The German Laws of War on Land, their handbook of military tactics, has organized crime into a science and killed in men the spiritual optic nerve.

* * * * * * *

In August of 1914, when the German Army was broken and compelled to retreat before the French, they passed through many French towns and villages in which they found no soldiers and no weapons, and where no battle, no skirmish, and no shot took place. During last July and August we went slowly from one of these ruined towns to another, talking with the broken-hearted women and children, comparing the photographs taken immediately after the German retreat and almost before the mutilated bodies were cold. Slowly we sifted the evidence. On the ground we compared the full official records made at the time with the statements of wretched survivors who live in cellars where once stood the beautiful homes, the orchards and vineyards, but where now all is desolation and anguish.

Among the multitude of events described by witnesses who survived the martyrdom of their village are the following: When the noise of the approach of Gen. Clauss's division of 20,000 soldiers in full retreat was heard an aged Frenchman stepped to his open door. He had retired from business to spend his last days midst the friends of his childhood and youth. Hearing the noise of the approaching army, the merchant stepped to his open door. As the first automobile swept by the German officers lifted their revolvers and emptied the lead into the old man's body. He pitched forward down the stone steps and in his death struggle worked his way to the wrought-iron gate, where after the German retreat he was found dead.

Before touching the body official photographers, under the direction of their noble prefect, took their photographs from different angles. In the garden behind the smoking cellar was found the wife, lying dead upon the grass, her left wrist tied by the clothesline to the root of an apple tree, the right wrist tied to a clump of gooseberry bushes. She was dead, but not through dagger or pistol. Standing beside their graves we studied the photographs and talked with the families of the 15 aged men whom Gen. Clauss ordered shot because there were no young or middle-aged men in the village whom he could kill.

BURNING OF AN AMBULANCE DRIVER.

Most harrowing the testimony given by the mother of a Red Cross ambulance driver. The day before the Germans came this man had returned from the front, bringing an ambulance filled with wounded soldiers. While the division of 20,000 Germans were looting the houses and carrying away every rug, carpet, table, chair, picture, tool, and art treasure toward the Rhine, German officers entered the house of Sister Juliet, who was nursing the wounded soldiers. Finding the young Red Cross man there, they immediately shot him. Later, while his mother was holding his head in her arms and staunching his wounds, a German officer approached and seizing her hands held them behind her back, while one of the privates poured petrol over her son's head. With two fingers this soldier ripped the clothes from the breast of the wounded man and poured oil under his shirt and then set fire to his garments. Referring to his death struggles and the photograph of the charred mass that had once been her son lying on the brick pavement, this mother exclaimed, "If I had only let him bleed to death! If I had only let him bleed to death! Then they could not have made him die twice!"

THE MURDER OF HEREMINEL.

In a little farming village not many miles from Gerberviller the Martyred stands a battered square belfry into which the Germans listed their machine guns, hoping to hold back the pursuit of the French Army, thus giving Gen. Clauss time to retreat and "dig in" some miles to the northeast. Tying the ropes to the axle of automobile trucks, the Germans soon lifted their guns into the church tower. They then drove the French women and children into the church and used them as a screen. One young mother did not immediately obey because of certain duties in connection with her little child. With two other girls this young wife was stood up against the stone wall of her own little house and shot, for the purpose of teaching French women to obey instantly when German savages command.

When all the women and children were packed into the church a boy was sent back to tell the French that if they fired upon the guns in the church belfry they would kill their own families. Two nights later, when a storm was raging, the women slipped a little boy through the window and sent word to the officers of the approaching French Army that their wives wished them to open fire on the German guns. In blowing these weapons out of the belfry the French killed 20 of their own wives and children, who preferred to share death with the men they loved rather than suffer nameless indignities from German brutes. In a hundred years of history where shall you find a record of soldiers, whether red, black, or yellow, save Germans, who were such sneaking, sniveling cowards that they do not dare play the game fairly and like men, but in their chattering terror use women and little children as shields against danger? Of a truth, the "Potsdam gang" has added a new word to the literature of cowardice.

* * * * * * *

For centuries the enemies of farms, houses, towns, and cities have been fire, flood, and earthquake. Witness the city of St. Pierre. An interior explosion blew off the cap of the mountain and a flood of gas poured down upon the lovely city, asphyxiated the citizens, and left not one house standing. Witness that mighty convulsion in San Francisco, that brought thousands of brick buildings crashing down in ruins. Witness the fire in Chicago that turned the great city into piles of twisted iron and ashes. In New Zealand there is a lake called Avernus, the birdless lake. Poisonous gases rise from the black flood of water, and soon the lark with its song and the eagle with its flight fall into the poisonous flood.

But all these images are quite inadequate to explain the devastation of France upon the retreat of the Germans. About 40 miles north of Paris one strikes the ruined region. Then hour after hour passes, while with slow movement and breaking heart the investigator journeys 100 miles to the north and zigzags 125 miles south again through that ruined region. Centuries ago Julius Caesar described it as a wild land, rough, with forests filled with wolves. Then the Frenchman entered the scene.

He subdued all the wild grasses, drained the valleys, and widened the streams into canals. He enriched the fields, surrounded the meadows with odorous hedges and filled swamps with perfumed shrubs. Slowly the Frenchman threw arches of stone across the streams and carved the bridges until they were rich in art, while everything made for use was carried up to beauty. He gave to the roof of the barn its lovely lines; the approach to the house was upon a curved road, the highways were shaded by two rows of noble trees. The stony hillside was terraced, and there the vines grew purple in the sun. How simple was his life! What a sanctuary his little home! With what rich embroidery of wheat he covered all the hills! He was prudent without being stingy, thrifty without being mean. The French peasant saves against old age with one hand and distributes to his children with the other.

WHAT HATE CAN DO.

And having lavished all their love upon the little farmhouse, the granary, and the garden, having pruned these grapevines with their clusters of white and purple, the time came when each vine seemed like a friend, dear as that miraculous picture was to Baucis and Philemon. For these reasons all France was invested with affection and beauty.

The French peasants loved their land and then lost it. One morning the Hun stood at the gate. The farmers with their pruning knives were no match for Germans with their machine guns, and down they fell under the plum trees they were pruning. The devastated regions of France are like unto a world ruined by devils. The Germans cut down the apples, the pears, and all the peaches. They did not spare the cherry, the quince, the gooseberry, and currant, or the vineyard. Gone also all the beautiful bridges—they have been dynamited! Gone all the lovely and majestic thirteenth-century churches! Gone all the galleries, for some of the finest art treasures in the world have perished.

The land has been put back to where it was when Julius Caesar described it 2,000 years ago—a wild land, and waste, growing up with thorns and thistles. That proclamation on a wall tells the whole story. "Let no building stand, no vine or tree. Before retreating see that the wells and springs are plentifully polluted with corpses and with creosote." The spirit was this, "Since we Germans can not have this land, no one else shall."

PRINCE EITEL'S CRIME.

But there is more. One of the historic chateaux is that of Avricourt, rich in noble associations of history. It was one of the class of buildings covered by a clause in the international agreements between Germany, France, and the United States and all the civilized nations, safeguarding historic buildings. For many months it was the home of Prince Eitel, the Kaiser's second son.

When a judge and jury held inquiry at the ruins of the chateau, the aged French servant, who understood the electric lighting and had charge of the gas plant during Eitel's occupancy, stated that he heard the German officers telling Eitel Frederick that he would disgrace the German name if he destroyed a building that had no relation to war, that could be of no aid or comfort to the French Army, and that he would make his own name, and that of his family, a name of shame and contempt, of obloquy and scorn. But the man would not yield. He brought in his auto trucks and carried to the freight cars every historic object in the splendid chateau. Having pledged himself to leave the building uninjured, the prince stopped his car at the gates of the exit, ran back to this historic house, filled his firebrand, spread the flames upon the halls, waited until the flames were well in progress, and then ordered his men to light the fuse of dynamite bombs. A few days later inquiry was held and testimony of aged servants and little children was taken. The degeneracy of this German prince as then revealed has not been equaled since the first chapter of Romans catalogued the unnatural crimes of the men of the ancient world.

Germany has no artistic sense. Her own poet, Heine, predicts that she will yet pull in pieces her one fine cathedral. The German poet does not think any beautiful thing is safe so long as it is in German hands. This gifted Hebrew had the vision that literally saw the German pounding to pieces the cathedral at Louvain and Ypres, in Arras, in Bapaume, in St. Quentin, and Rheims.

I now come to some extracts that are so horribly vile and indecent in their details that they are not fit to be printed in a publication of general circulation. It is all right to publish them in a book which only those who wish may buy and read, but I do not believe they are fit to be in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They relate how thousands of French and Belgian women had their breasts cut out by German soldiers and the reason why they were cut out. They are so bloodcurdling and shocking to every sense of decency that I will not read these pages. They embody sexual subjects, including a scheme to impregnate all of France and Belgium with venereal disease, and the book tells how this scheme was systematically practiced on a large scale; and it also, in the next few succeeding pages, tells how some of the wives and daughters and sisters of French and Belgian soldiers were treated by German soldiers, but they are too horrible and vile to read. There was no excuse for the vile conduct detailed, even from the standpoint of lustful bestiality, because in the rear of all of the German armies were great numbers of kept women, kept there with the knowledge, sanction, approval, and by provision of the German authorities.

I will skip those horrible, shocking things, and read a few other extracts as to individual atrocities.

Here is a German song. It shows the principles which the German people cherish and the principles upon which they conduct warfare:

Oh, Germany, hate! Slaughter thy foes by the millions, and of their reeking corpses build a monument that shall reach the clouds.

Oh, Germany, hate now! Arm thyself in steel and pierce with thy bayonet the heart of every foe; no prisoners! Lock all their lips in silence; turn our neighbors' lands into deserts.

Oh, Germany, hate! Salvation will come of thy wrath. Beat in their skulls with rifle butts and with axes. These bandits are beasts of the chase, they are not men. Let your clenched fist enforce the judgment of God.

Oh, Germany, the time to hate has come. Strike and thrust, true and hard. Battalions, batteries, squadrons, all to the front! Afterwards thou wilt stand erect on the ruins of the world, healed forever of thine ancient madness, of thy love for the alien.

Here is a German hymn, so styled:

We have but one single hate;
We love as one, we hate as one;
We have but one single foe,
Whom you all know, whom you all know.
He sits crouched behind the gray flood,
Full of envy, full of fury, full of craft, full of guile,
Set apart by waters that are thicker than blood.
We wish to go before a seat of judgment
To swear an oath, face to face,
An oath of metal no wind can blow away,
An oath for children and children's children.
Hearken to the word, repeat the word,
It rolls on through all Germany:
We will not forbear from our hate.

I will read now a few brief extracts of individual atrocities that were amply proven by affidavits, the testimony of eyewitnesses, diaries, documentary, and other undoubted proof.

A boy with his hands cut off, mutilated by a German officer, because he was supposed to have laughed at this drunken brute.

A Belgian babe, skewered upon the bayonet, driven through his stomach, with his little head and hands and legs dangling as the German proudly carried it through the street of a village.

A mother superior crucified by bayonets to the door of her schoolhouse as punishment for scratching the face of an officer, who was violating the person of a young nun. The burning alive of a man who defended his wife.

Photographs of an aged priest, staked down to the ground, and used as a lavatory until he was dead; photographs and affidavits of young girls with one breast cut off.

The dead body of a young girl nailed by her hands to the outside door of a cottage. She was about 14 or 16 years of age.

"September 14. One hundred and eight inhabitants are stated to have been shot after they had dug their own graves. Innumerable houses have been destroyed. The population looks bitter and scowling." August 22 (notebook of Private Max Thomas): "Our soldiers are so excited, we are like wild beasts. To-day destroyed eight houses, with their inmates. Bayoneted two men with their wives, and a girl of 18. The little one almost unnerved me, so innocent was her expression."

In retreating from Laines eight drunken soldiers were marching through the street. A little child of 2 years came out and a soldier skewered the child on his bayonet and carried it away while his comrades sang.

Withdrawing from Hofstade, in addition to other atrocities, the Germans cut off both hands of a boy of 16. At the inquest affidavits were taken from 25 witnesses who saw the boy before he died or just afterwards.

Passing through Haecht, in addition to the young women whom they violated and killed, a child 3 years old was found nailed by its hands and feet to a door.

"The captain served a requisition upon all the farmers hereabouts, taking horses, oxen, wagons, milk, and butter. These people are so ignorant that they did not know when he gave them false receipts and signed this name—Herr von Koepenick." Other peasants received receipts stating that in return for the goods that have been requisitioned by the German officers, the owner was to come to the German quartermaster and receive his pay in 20 strokes of a whip lash. If all the diaries of the Germans now in the hands of the English, Belgian, and French authorities were brought together and published they would make a small library, and the title would be "Confessions of Crime by German Soldiers."

"August 19. Halted and plundered a villa, as invariably the surrounding houses were immediately plundered; dined splendidly, drank 11 bottles of champagne, 4 bottles of wine, and 6 bottles of liquor."

Joan Vanderschoot, Tenth Company, Thirty-ninth Infantry, Seventh Army Corps. "August 19.—Quartered in the university. Boozed through the streets of Liege; lie on straw; booze in plenty; little food; so we must steal. We live like gods here in Belgium."

H. W. Heller, August 6: "Friday at 8.30 came the news that the English had landed in Belgium. We smashed everything immediately. One sees only burning houses and heaps of dead people and dead horses every three steps."

Fritz Holman writes: "We are never thirsty here in France. We drink five and six bottles of champagne a day, and as to underlinen, we simply loot a house and change. God only knows what will happen unto us later on."

Stephen Luther's diary: "There was terrible destruction; in a farmhouse saw a woman who had been completely stripped and who lay on burnt beams. How savage! Terrible conditions in the destroyed houses. August 24, 1914, in Ermiton we took about a thousand prisoners. At least 500 were shot."

Are those things not worthy of consideration in determining whether or not Germany should pay full indemnity to the entente allies and the United States for all the damage and cost she has incurred in this horrible war? Are those things not proper for consideration in determining whether or not Germany should be admitted to the peace conference? Are they not worthy of consideration in determining whether or not Germany is fit to be admitted to a world league of nations composed of civilized nations for the preservation of peace? Are those things not to be a factor in the determination of what is justice? If Germany is barred from a world league of nations and from the peace conference and required to pay to the uttermost farthing full indemnity, now or in future generations, for all the costs of this horrible war, are those things not a proper factor to consider as provocation and justification? If they are considered, is it to be termed revenge, or a spirit of animosity, or are they proper factors to be considered in the administration of justice?

I say those things simply prove that Germany should pay full indemnity in this or future generations, no matter how long it may take, for all the cost incurred by the entente allies and the United States in defeating her in this horrible war. I say they prove conclusively that Germany should not be permitted to sit at the peace table; that Germany is not fit to be admitted to any league of nations composed of civilized nations for the preservation of peace.

I will read a few further extracts from this work to show the spirit of Germany, the spirit with which she prosecuted this infamous warfare of spoliation and crime:

One of the Kaiser's speeches contains the explanation of his dream of becoming a world conqueror: "From my childhood I have been under the influence of five men—Alexander, Julius Cæsar, Theodoric II, Frederic the Great, and Napoleon. Each of these men dreamed a dream of a world empire; they failed. I am dreaming a dream of a German world empire, and my mailed fist shall succeed."

* * * * * * *

One of the Pan German Empire pamphlets and many of the German newspapers contain a revised map of Europe, showing "Germania" stamped across the Continent, with St. Petersburg, Paris, and London become county-seat towns, paying tribute to the world capital, Berlin. Many German newspapers, during this war, have published maps showing Canada as a German Province, with the name "Germania" stamped across South America, Mexico, and Central America. These many pamphlets and Pan German Empire books explain Admiral Dewey's report to President McKinley. That report seems to have been written in the cabin of the flag ship Olympia, in Manila Bay. Dewey states that the German admiral told him plainly to make a note of this prophecy that within 15 years (1899, report of Admiral Dewey) Germany would crush France and Belgium, seize Holland and Denmark, utterly destroy England, and take Canada as a German Province. Admiral Dewey added that the German admiral told him that while the Kaiser intended to seize New York and Washington and hold them for an indemnity, he did not intend to permanently hold in subjection the United States, but he did intend to retain Mexico and South America, and then "dispose of the Monroe doctrine as he thinks best." This may explain the Kaiser's word to Mr. Gerard: "After this war I will stand no nonsense from the United States."

* * * * * * *

When the Kaiser first announced his Pan German Empire scheme he bribed his people by appeals to avarice, ambition, and jealousy of England and Russia. The arguments used by the Potsdam gang were very simple: Agriculture pays 6 per cent; trade, 8 per cent; finance, 10 per cent; shipping, 12 per cent; but war is an industry that pays 50 per cent dividend upon the investment. Germany's war upon little Denmark, a people without army or navy, paid an enormous dividend upon the investment in that it gave Germany one of her richest Provinces, made possible the Kiel Canal, and left Denmark permanently crippled and exposed. "Denmark and Holland, also, are apples," says a German author, "that are slowly ripening, and we will pick the fruit at the proper time." Germany's war of 1864 upon Austria was the attack of a brigand upon a traveler rich with gold, and the cities and Provinces that Germany wrested away from the ruler of Vienna paid 100 per cent upon the investment.

In 1911 the Kaiser spread out before his people bribes most alluring. Just as the Devil led Jesus up into a mountain and showed Him the whole earth, so the Kaiser and the Potsdam gang led the Germans into a mount of temptation and showed them how easy it was to make the Kaiser a world emperor. The argument was very simple; after 25 years of preparation Germany has 9,000,000 soldiers, has cannon, liquid fire, poisoned gases, battleships, aeroplanes, with every wagon and automobile ready to have the pleasure body removed and a military body substituted. "We are ready to the last buckle on the horses' harness."

To the east was Russia, broken by war with Japan; Russia with her gold mines, her wheat granaries, her vast coal and iron deposits and forests, all undeveloped. To the southeast was Roumania with her oil wells; with Constantinople and the silk fields; and the Tigres, the gateway to the Indian Ocean and the treasures of the Bagdad Railway country. To the west was unarmed Belgium, rich with 20 billions of treasure; France, half armed, with her newly discovered iron mines and coal measures; England, one vast jewel box, a kind of Aladdin's cave. "Wait until Germany lifts her mailed fists upon the English treasure box; there will be enough for everybody in Berlin," is the gist of Zimmermann's speech of November, 1914. "The people of the United States call us Huns," writes the editor of the Local-Anzeiger, but New York had better remember that the young Huns from the German forests took only two weeks to cross the Alps and loot the city of Rome."

* * * * * * *

At last the woven web was spread all over the world through spies. Could any man have been lifted up above Berlin and had full power to survey the whole world, he would have seen a spider's web, with its center in Berlin, with the Kaiser as the big black spider, sending out along the sinuous threads, into every capital of every country and of every continent, his evil plans and plots. Men like Von Bernstorff in Washington and Münsterberg in Boston, Von Bopp, recently convicted in San Francisco, Luxburg in Buenos Aires, with their schemes to blow up munition factories, planting of bombshells in ships, dynamiting parliament buildings, blowing up bridges, organizing sedition in Mexico, India, and Brazil, the millions and millions of dollars spent in our own country, the secret decorations of medals given to bankers, manufacturers, shippers, editors, newspaper boys, stenographers, make up a story of Machiavellian deviltry and subtle cunning that has no parallel.

This counsellor of litigation tells us that on the German day, October 6, 1901, Germanism in the United States was organized at Philadelphia. The diplomat then tells us how, directed by the German ambassador, he went up and down the United States organizing in New York, Brooklyn, Chicago, Milwaukee, Cincinnati, and St. Louis the German soldiers' societies of the United States, and wooing the German-Americans over to the point where they would see that their first allegiance was to be the Fatherland, their second to the United States. The German foreign office and the Kaiser were constantly sending Von Holleben for German-American flags, decorations, gracious letters, medals, invitations to visit Germany and meet the royalty—methods that culminated in the German law that made it possible for pro-Germans in this country and for their sons, despite American citizenship, to keep their German citizenship, with all the rights of suffrage in the fatherland. Very significant also one sentence in these reminiscences of this German diplomat: "The relations between official Germany and the emigrant subjects of the emperor, whether they have become citizens of the Republic or not, may lead to serious complications between Germany and the United States and to unforeseen incidents which at any moment may involve both powers in serious difficulty."

No scholar longer doubts that the German Government fully expected that when war was declared some six or eight thousand German-Americans belonging to the German societies in the United States would bring about something akin to civil war. This is not to be wondered at, in view of the fact that for years Germany's official representatives had been receiving from time to time honors and addresses from the Kaiser and sending back to Berlin cablegrams pledging undying faithfulness and loyalty, and affirming their purpose to enthrone German culture in the United States. This diplomat quotes in full the address of the German ambassador in behalf of the Kaiser on presenting the German colors to the German Military Society of Chicago. "Greetings from the German Emperor! That is the cry with which I come before you. His Majesty, my most gracious master, has ordered me to hand to you to-day the color which has been desired by you so strongly and for so long. The color is a token of His Majesty's approval with which the Kaiser remembers in love and friendship those who have served in the German Army and Navy and those who have fought and bled for the fatherland. This color is to be the symbol of German faithfulness, German manliness, and German military honor. His Majesty asks you to accept this color as a token of that unity which should prevail among all German soldiers, to act also abroad (think of that, 'abroad' in Chicago) in accordance with the sentiments of German loyalty and German sense of duty, and to take for your maxim the words of that great German, Bismarck: 'We Germans fear God but nothing else in the world.' Now let the color flutter in the wind. In this moment of enthusiasm let us all sound the cry that is now on the lips of every old German soldier—His Majesty, the German Emperor, William II, hurrah, hurrah, hurrah!"

I ask you to remember that that message was sent to the people in this country who styled themselves "German-Americans."

Resuming my reading:

The history of no country contains plot so astounding! Under cover of hospitality the German guest was planting bombshells in the home of his host. With infinite cunning, the German diplomats built a German kingdom within our kingdom.

* * * * * * *

Read the article by that American physician, who left Germany last summer by way of Switzerland. Note that when a train of English soldiers passed through the town, a train loaded with prisoners packed in freight cars, without sanitation, wounded men, who had been without food or drink for three days, men who, with black lips, begged the German women for water; that these women held water just out of reach of these English soldiers, and then spilling it on the ground, spat in the faces of these wounded men!

I pause in my reading to say that they are the same German women who are now appealing to the women of the United States to prevail upon the authorities in this country to furnish them with food. They are probably the same German women who had the audacity to send a message to the wife of the President of the United States and appeal to her to interest the authorities and the women of this country in a plan to furnish food to the people of Germany.

Resuming my reading:

When Germans were marching into a Belgian village, a German captain ordered the villagers to go into the church. The houses were then searched. Unfortunately no weapons were found, and therefore there was no excuse for looting the town and then burning the buildings. The diary of a German soldier says that his captain showed him a window opening into the cellar of a Belgian house, and told him to put a gun in through the window. A few minutes later the captain "discovered" the gun, and taking the weapon into the church told all the villagers that concealed weapons had been found, and they must all be shot and the village destroyed. The German burglar's life was sacred, but the honest householder's life and that of his family were as nothing, losing all rights because the German burglar has broken open the door.

* * * * * * *

That is an illustration of German honor.

Three years of battle have lessened the wealth of the allied nations, but vastly increased the treasures of Germany. This war has cost Great Britain $30,000,000,000, it has cost France $20,000,000,000, it has cost the United States $10,000,000,000. For these billions expended there has been for the allies no financial return. In striking contrast thereto, consider that if Germany has spent $20,000,000,000 upon this war, she has won another $20,000,000,000, and even claims to have won $30,000,000,000. Thus far, her armies, like those of ancient Rome, have looted four countries. She has carried away their gold, silver, copper, iron, steel, stocks, bonds; she has stolen their locomotives, passenger coaches, freight cars, wagons, automobiles, with all the goods of merchants. In the face of her solemn treaties she has stolen the horses, cattle, oxen, sheep; she has spoiled the granaries of their wheat, rye, and barley. She has looted the Belgian and French factories of their machinery, and carried away the looms from the mills for cotton, wool, and silk. The total value of the steel mills of Belgium and of France, with all lathes and stationary engines, is almost incalculable. She looted the iron and coal mines of Belgium and France and the wells of Roumania for the oil; she has looted the mines of Poland, Roumania, and Serbia of their bronze, lead, zinc, copper. She has loaded thousands upon thousands of freight trains with household furniture, agricultural implements, goods from the merchants' stores, art treasures from public galleries, as well as from private houses. In every city and town, in every store and farmer's house, the Germans attack first of all the safety vaults and the little money chests of rich and poor alike. Germany found Belgium worth $20,000,000,000. It is probable that she has spoiled Belgium of at least $8,000,000,000.

The national fortunes of the invaded territories were estimated at fifty billions, and most of this, after three years, is now in the hands of the Germans. Each attack made by Germany has been against a rich people, whose treasures she could loot, while every attack made by the allies has been to recover a land already devastated, poor, and helpless. In choosing Napoleon, therefore, rather than Jesus, Germany chose the motto of aggressive warfare and has made war an investment too profitable to be readily abandoned.

The peril to the allies is the greater because of the vicious methods used by Germany. All military experts know that wars are fought incidentally with guns at the trenches, but in reality with granaries at the rear. Better a million well-fed men with naked fists than 2,000,000 of armed men who are starving, for the starving men will soon be too weak to lift the guns and the well-fed men will grasp the weapons. From the viewpoint of food resources Germany has from the beginning occupied a unique position, in that she is rimmed all around about with little nations unprepared and unarmed and therefore impotent to protect their granaries and root cellars, their herds and flocks, when Germans come in to steal them. Whenever Germany has, therefore, been short of food she has organized an expedition and looted some land like Belgium or Poland. The next winter she sends an army out to loot Roumania. Now that the harvests have been gathered in upon the fields of Italy, Germany is trying to despoil that land.

Whenever she has had to withdraw a million men from the fields to send them to the front Germany has impressed another million from Belgium, Poland, or Roumania and forced these slaves to plow her fields, reap her harvests, and all without wage.

In view of those recitals, nearly all of which are amply substantiated by incontrovertible proof, is it any injustice to ask that Germany reimburse the people of this country for every dollar that they expended in preventing Germany from despoiling and ruining the entire world? Can any spirit of revenge or animosity be found in such a request? I believe not. I do not believe that justice can be done to Germany in this world or by any human method, but I hope that our delegates to the peace conference will insist that Germany pay to the full the bill that she justly owes this country on account of the expense incurred in defending the world against her criminal aggression.

I have many newspaper clippings, mostly of the Associated Press, of well authenticated instances of the shocking brutality of German atrocity during the war. Here I submit some of them, only a few of many, as follows:

LONDON, July 11.

In the course of a lecture on the Zeebrugge operations, Naval Paymaster Collingwood Hughes narrated to-day a story illustrative of German cruelty and callousness. He said a patrol boat discovered a derelict German submarine from which it rescued the crew.

The commander was assured by the German captain that there were no others aboard and he was about to blow up the boat and sink her when he heard tappings from the inside. A search revealed four British seamen tied up as prisoners.

"The Germans," the lecturer added, "were going to allow those poor fellows to be hurled into eternity after their own lives had been saved."

LONDON, November 25.

Pitiable conditions among British prisoners of war who have been liberated by the Germans since the signing of the armistice are described by Reuter's correspondent at French headquarters. Thousands of those men, mostly British, are entering France daily. The correspondent writes:

"I have never seen human beings in such a state of raggedness, hunger, and misery. When the camp at Forbach, 38 miles east of Metz, as well as those elsewhere, were broken up the prisoners, most of whom were captured during the March offensive, were told to clear out and seek help from the allies. They started to walk the 50 or 60 miles to the allied lines, but were given no food and had no money. They were in shameful rags, the soles dropping off their boots. Some wore clogs and no socks.

"They left the prison camps in droves of hundreds in charge of German officers and soldiers who had deserted. The weather was very cold and many died by the roadside within a few miles from friends. When the survivors entered the French lines French soldiers who were hardened war heroes were horrified to see men in such a plight. It is not doubted that this suffering was intentionally imposed upon the British. Prisoners of other nationalities are agreed that the British were treated worse than the others at all German camps."

A further report of Sir Robert Younger's committee dealing with the treatment of British prisoners in the coal and salt mines of Germany gives harrowing details of brutal treatment by the Germans. This report says:

"From testimony scarcely a month old it is evident that there is no sign of improvement whatever in the treatment of prisoners in Germany. This disgrace is open and flagrant and the only possible inference is that Berlin deliberately approves of it.

PARIS, August 15.

With more than 200 churches in his diocese totally destroyed, the others damaged and robbed of priceless ornaments, sculptures and sacred vases; 50 of his priests captured and condemned to years of hard labor in Germany, and 300,000 parishioners driven from their homes, Mgr. Pechenard, bishop of Soissons, is burdened with grief.

Barbarism of the Germans and their obvious delight in ruining all things French, especially churches, has leveled to the ground some of the most famous and noted edifices in the Soissons district. They destroyed everything possible inside the churches which they could not destroy with their guns.

Because they remained in their respective towns, helping aged and infirm who could not flee before the invader, 50 priests were taken captive. These, it has been learned, have been sentenced to 5, 10, and 15 years in the working forces of Germany.

"The enemy has sowed death everywhere," said the bishop. "There where he passed nothing exists. The villages are destroyed. There are no houses, no industry, no commerce. I tremble when I think of the sadness of my people when they return to the places where their old homes stood.

"The brutal treatment complained of was that sick men, so long as they were able to stand, were compelled by the sentries to continue working. Anyone who refused was beaten with rifles and bayonets until he began again, or, if this failed, he was forced to stand at attention in front of the sentry on the main gate until the shift had returned from work, a period of anything up to 8 or 10 hours. If they fainted or became too weak and still refused, they were put in a cell behind some big ovens, where the air was extremely bad and the heat fearful. They were sometimes kept in this place for two or three days in this terrific heat until they agreed to work. During this time no food from parcels was allowed, the German food being the only kind, and the only way of quenching thirst was the allowance of two bottles of water a day.

"Another soldier who refused to complete his task was taken out of the mine dressed only in a shirt and drawers (it was too hot in the mine to wear anything else) and was put for the night in a hut which was not weatherproof. In the morning it was half full of snow. The next day he was taken to the mine again and beaten until he had finished his task. A Russian prisoner was shot in cold blood for trying to escape from the salt mines at Ehmem. A civilian stopped him until the sentries got up to him. One sentry hit him on the head with the butt end of a rifle, splitting his head open and breaking the butt of the rifle. Two of them dragged him back by the arm. He was half walking and half being dragged along the ground. A sentry, without any orders at all, walked up to him and fired point-blank at his chin. The bullet entered his chin and blew away the back part of his head."

The accommodation provided in the huts where the men lived appears to have been abominable. At the Neuhof salt mine the men slept in triple-deck beds, with two men in each bed. Except for a narrow passage about 2 feet wide, there was no room to move about. The beds were full of vermin, and there were a large number of black beetles and other insects on the walls and floor. Owing to the crowded condition, it was impossible to keep the place clean. Everywhere it is the same story of dirt, discomfort, and foul drainage.

WITH THE BRITISH ARMY OF OCCUPATION, December 3.

At Liege, Spa, and Verviers one meets the same universal disgust and loathing of the Germans as everywhere. One hears the same tales of looting, espionage, and impositions, but the topic of all others to which it is impossible to refrain from returning is German treatment of prisoners, especially the British.

In all the black story of Germany's conduct in this war there is nothing viler than her treatment of the sick prisoners in hospitals up to the time of the armistice. I heard this same tale several places, but know the facts best as they occurred in Namur.

The treatment of sick prisoners almost always was bad. Their diet consisted of 4 ounces of black bread a day, with coffee in the morning, rice soup at noon, and a teaspoonful of jam every 47 hours. Our doctors tell me every prisoner was suffering and still suffers from intestinal troubles. All are emaciated and show evidence of neglect.

The culminating crime was the worst when the Germans made no attempt to hand the hospitals over to any authority or representative of the allies. They did not even inform the patients or civilians where they were going. They merely went away and left the patients alone. At Namur there were a dozen places used as hospitals, of the existence of which the civilian did not seem even to have been aware.

The consequence was the patients were left entirely to themselves. Into some hospitals the civilians penetrated the first day. Other patients remained absolutely unvisited for 48 hours, when, driven by hunger, some who could walk went out on the streets to seek food. Then only did the citizens hear of the situation. When they entered the hospitals they found an almost incredible state of affairs.

In one institution six patients lay dead in their beds. There were 11 dead in the hospitals at Namur and 17 in one institution in Nivelles. The conditions were very filthy and evidences of neglect were loathsome. The places were littered with dirty bandages and refuse, so the atmosphere was terrible and the sufferings of the patients too dreadful for words.

It was five days after the Germans left the hospitals before the first British medical officers arrived and 10 days before there was anything like a proper supply of invalid food and medical necessities.

Meanwhile the residents of the town did everything possible. Many worked in the hospitals regularly until the British took them over. An organization, of which the Catholic fathers were at the head, did all possible to repair the German barbarity.

Altogether there were 600 prisoners in the hospitals at Namur, and 200 more arrived in the town exhausted and became patients. Of all the accursed things the Germans have done in the war, I doubt if anything has been so truly damnable as this.

One sergeant, who had been prisoner for seven months, spoke bitterly of an enforced march after his capture.

For four days, he said, the prisoners had virtually no solid food, and when they arrived at camp they were put to work burying men who had died from starvation. In one week 15 out of 100 died. No pity or leniency was shown to men who were unable to work through sickness. Only blows and the usual punishments of half rations were given them.

A noncommissioned officer of the royal army medical corps said that the worst sight he saw was near Soissons. He was working in a hospital where English prisoners were suffering badly from dysentery.

While still alive a man was put into a coffin and some German soldiers were preparing to nail the lid of the coffin down.

"I protested," said the officer, "that the man was not dead, but I was laughed at and pushed to one side. The Germans proceeded with their grewsome task and afterwards informed me that they had nailed the coffin lid down with 4 and 6 inch nails."

Another man who said he had been captured eight months ago described the murder of an officer in a prison camp near the Aisne.

"In the camp one day," he said, "I saw a British officer being bullied by a German sentry. The German soldier was demanding the officer's boots, but the officer refused to part with them. After a little further argument the German soldier shot the officer and took the boots from him as he lay dying on the ground."

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, February 3.

A London dispatch to the Ottawa agency of Reuter's (Ltd.) says it has received from a trustworthy Belgian citizen, who has just reached London from the German military zone at Valenciennes, an account of terrible conditions existing in occupied districts of France, from which virtually no news ever reached England. For obvious reasons it could not be stated how this man escaped. He still bore traces of a heavy blow on the jaw and showed Reuter's representative a handful of natural teeth which had been knocked out by the butt end of a German guard's rifle. He said:

"The Germans have organized a slavery army in the zone of northern France. When I left St. Armand a few weeks ago conditions were unbearable. All the men between the ages of 17 and 50 had been taken away. Unmarried women under 40 are obliged to work in the fields, while girls from 12 to 14 must collect acorns and nettles.

"Everywhere you meet civilians working under armed guard. Everyone wears a brassard showing the town he came from. Some wear brassards around the leg showing they tried to escape. I saw an old man with a large cross painted on his back. I knew what that signified. If you refuse to work you are fined; if you refuse to pay the fine you are imprisoned; if you refuse a second time you are sent to Germany, from where one seldom comes back alive."

PARIS, November 24.

The last party of Germans left Brussels by train last Sunday morning. As the train was about to leave reports stated the Germans had made a gift of wagonloads of food which was at the station and would not be taken away, and was to be given to whomever might come to fetch it. The result was that the people of the neighborhood collected at the station.

While they were waiting a series of vast explosions took place, in which at least 300 were killed and 150 wounded. It was extraordinary to witness the street crowded with people carrying the national flag and rejoicing at the approach of their saviors, while the sky was filled with clouds at the time set for the explosions.

At Hammont a German munition train blew up and burned two German hospital trains, killing 1,000 wounded men and partly wrecking the town. Hammont is a Belgian frontier station on the railway through Dutch Limburg, on which the Germans had promised the Dutch to carry no military supplies.

Free Poland, a periodical devoted to the best interests of the Polish people and their ultimate independence, prints a graphic and startling article by Frederick Walcott, in which he describes scenes of starvation and desolation in Poland that are amazing.

Mr. Walcott went to Poland 18 months ago, in order to see with his own eyes the actual condition of the people. He says that along the roadside from Warsaw to Pinsk, a distance of 230 miles, nearly a half million Poles had died of hunger and cold. He saw the road strewn with their bones, picked clean by the crows. With their usual thrift the Germans were collecting the larger bones to be milled into fertilizers.

"Wicker baskets were scattered along the way—the basket in which the baby swings from the rafter in every peasant home," he says. "Every mile there were scores of them. I started to count, but I had to give it up; there were so many of them.

"They told me 1,000,000 persons were made homeless in six weeks of the German drive in August and September, 1916. They told me 400,000 died on the way. The rest, scarcely half alive, got through with the Russian Army. Many of these people have been sent to Siberia. It is these people whom the Paderewski committee is trying to relieve.

"In the refugee camps 300,000 survivors of the flight were gathered by the Germans, members of broken families. They were lodged in jerry-built barracks, scarcely waterproof, unlighted, unwarmed in the middle of winter. Their clothes, where the buttons were lost, were sewed on. Filth and infection from vermin were spreading. They were famished, their daily ration being a cup of soup and a piece of bread.

"In Warsaw, which had not been destroyed, the streets were lined with people in the pangs of starvation. They squatted here with their elbows on their knees or leaning against the buildings, too feeble to lift a hand for a bit of money or a morsel of bread if one offered it. Charity did what it could. The rich gave all they had; the poor shared their last crust.

"In that situation the German commander issued a proclamation. Every able-bodied Pole was bidden to Germany to work. If they refused, they let no other Pole give him to eat not so much as a mouthful, under penalty of German military law.

"Staying with his folk he is doomed and they are not saved. Leaving them he will be cut off from his family. Germany will set him to work, that a German workingman may be released to fight against his own land and people."

At Courtacon the Prussian guards forced the mayor, four men of the commune and a boy of 13 years to act as a screen against French firing. These five escaped with their lives, but the Germans found a boy of 16 who belonged to the Belgian conscript class, but who had not yet been called. They first stripped him naked and then executed him.

At La Ferte-Gaucher Germans broke into a house and violated a woman in the presence of her 4-year-old child. Pressing on to Mauperthuis, they seized a civilian from his house and executed him, together with a hostage whom they had brought with them from Courtacon. They also seized and shot two aged caretakers of a neighboring farm.

At Gembloux, after the Germans had retreated, pursuing Belgian troops found the dead body of a woman pinned to the door of a house by a sword driven through her chest. The body was naked and the breasts had been cut off.

At Peronnes the Germans burned 63 houses and shot 8 civilians, including the burgomaster. The relatives of the executed civilians were ordered, under threat of death, not to touch the bodies and they lay in the street for 48 hours.

At La Ferte-Gaucher a woman who resisted the advances of a German officer was turned over by him to four of his men and ravished by them in turn as the officer looked on.

At Monceau-sur-Sambre, on the same day, the Germans burned 251 houses after looting them and shot down 28 persons, including women and children, as they fled from their burning homes. Thirty others received wounds from which they afterwards died, and 12 were executed by firing squads.

Four days before a young lieutenant had sat there; to-day he was gone. He had been taken prisoner, and that morning his body had been found by Italian troops in their advance. His eyes had been torn from their sockets and his tongue cut out and other unmentionable injuries had been inflicted. This is the kind of enemy that comes now asking for mercy and compassion.

In one town I passed through an old man met the advancing Italians and led them into the courtyard of his house where the bodies of his two daughters, girls about 17 years old, lay dead. The father said that before they had been smothered to death they had been the victims of 23 Austrian soldiers.

As an illustration of the spirit of Germany not only in waging warfare but with which she agreed to the armistice for the cessation of hostilities, I call attention to the fact that Germany has already in numerous well-authenticated instances violated the terms of the armistice, the solemn compact which her representatives signed with the representatives of the entente allies and the United States. In having her armies retreat from Belgium and France, in direct violation of her solemn pledge and the terms of the armistice, her soldiers continued to loot and steal and destroy; carried away with them live stock, household goods, and everything of value upon which they could lay their hands. They have also violated the terms of the armistice in other respects. They continue to wage war against Poland and to help the Bolsheviki in Russia, in direct and palpable violation of their solemn agreement expressed in the terms of the armistice.

I submit here a couple of newspaper clippings, two of many, showing that Germany is still defiant, unrepentant; showing her reckless disregard of armistice provisions. They are as follows:

REDS DISABLE 150 AEROS IN VIOLATION OF ARMISTICE.

BASEL, SWITZERLAND, November 29.

One hundred and fifty airplanes which had been gathered at the Boeblingen airdrome, 11 miles southwest of Stuttgart, to be handed over to the allies in accordance with the provisions of the armistice, have been rendered useless by order of the revolutionary committee, according to a Stuttgart dispatch received here.

Only 10 days remain before the expiration of the time allotted for Germany of the meeting of the armistice terms of Marshal Foch, and many of the details still remain not entirely complied with. This is particularly true as concerns article 4 of the armistice, regarding the surrender of war materials, especially guns and airplanes.

About 5,000 motor trucks have been delivered up, but the number of railroad engines turned over equals only half the number stipulated in the armistice—5,000. A great number of the 150,000 railway cars in good working order called for are still undelivered. In addition naval units, including submarines, remain in German seaports, although under the terms of the armistice they should have been surrendered.

Added to the nonfulfillment of the surrender of war paraphernalia is the failure of Germany to abide by her agreement to repatriate immediately a great number of entente soldiers held as prisoners, and in high quarters here the question has arisen if, in spite of Marshal Foch's accustomed indulgence, the interallied command will not be more severe in its dealings with Germany when the expected request by Germany for a further delay in meeting the allied terms comes up for discussion.

I believe before indulging in any generosity to such people, we should first insist upon justice to our own people. I believe in justice to Americans before generosity to such people as those of Germany and her allies in the war. Before Germany should expect anything except cold, unmitigated, plain, naked justice from the United States, before she should expect any generosity or any mercy, she ought to show some repentance. Germany is not repentant, Germany is still unrepentant. Not one iota of repentance has she exhibited for her criminal warfare, her monstrous attempt to subdue the world and destroy civilization. The German people are not sorry that they undertook the war. They are only sorry they did not win it and carry out their plans to subdue the world.

They are already boasting of the next war. They are declaring, and have declared ever since the cessation of hostilities, that their armies are unbeaten; that Germany is an unconquered nation; that there was no fighting on German soil; that German soldiers protected the fatherland from any devastation as a result of the war; and that they merely yielded to an armistice in order not to inflict any further destruction upon the world.

I have some newspaper clippings on that subject, a few of many, which I here submit. They are as follows:

PARIS, November 29.

"Au revoir, we'll be back in five years," was the parting assertion of German officers and soldiers to the inhabitants of Strassburg. Many Germans were still extremely boastful as they left the city, and spoke of a new war which they said was sure to come, with Germany better prepared economically to withstand a blockade.

ASSERT ARMY IS UNBEATEN.

Here as in Treves, the home-going Germans received a great welcome from the civil population. All Germans assert the army returned unbeaten. Certainly the attitude of the inhabitants of Coblenz is not that of a beaten people. In the evening the cafés are crowded with well-dressed men and women, and there are music and animation in all the brightly lighted resorts.

LONDON, December 31.

Germany is reducing to and not below her prewar standard, according to Gen. Sir Frederick Maurice, who, writing in the London Daily News, says:

"Germany is demobilizing on a definite plan. The German general staff is at work at Cassel, and, as usual, is working systematically, despite the disturbances in Berlin.

"Since the signing of the armistice something like 2,000,000 German soldiers have been disbanded, but Germany is reducing her army to and not below her prewar standard of about 800,000 men. Her plans are to keep two annual classes with the colors, but as her classes are weak owing to the war losses, she is at present keeping four classes. If this is allowed to continue, neither France nor the rest of us can be secure without armies, the maintenance of which will spell ruin. If we are to make the world safe, we allies must keep on the German frontier a sufficient force to enable us to impose terms which will make a recurrence of the events of August, 1914, impossible, and we British must take our share in this burden.

"By all means let's make Germany pay, and let those who have suffered most be paid first. If Germany can pay for 800,000 soldiers, she can pay for some of the damage she has done."

Herr Ebert said to returning German soldiers:

"You protected the homeland from invasion, sheltered your wives, children, and parents from flames and slaughter, and preserved the nation's workshops and field from devastation."

LONDON, December 22.

"We are prepared to lose Alsace-Lorraine and some colonies, as well as part of Poland. But there are limits. If anyone dares to touch the west bank of the Rhine or Danzig (Baltic port of Prussian Poland), Germany will rise as one man and make war again, even if we have no weapon left except poison gas."

Theodor Wolff, editor of the Berlin Tageblatt, recognized as Germany's most moderate-liberal journalist, is thus quoted in an interview with the Copenhagen newspaper Politiken. A resumé of the interview is telegraphed to the Daily Express.

"Germany," said Wolff, whose paper was repeatedly suppressed under the old regimé because of his liberal writings, and who personally had a leading hand in the overthrow of autocracy, "stands fast by President Wilson's program. She is counting upon real peace negotiations, not on a dictated peace.

"If a sensible peace is made, a democratic, progressive German republic is certain. But if we had thought that we were to be given over to brutal might we would have taken other steps. Our front was unbroken.

"We demand that the questions of Alsace-Lorraine, German Austria, and the eastern provinces be left to a vote to decide their independence.

"There must be no new economic barriers against Germany.

"We are not powerless. We are not humbled. Germany's 60,000,000 inhabitants can not indefinitely lie down under such threats, but they will arise again to be a powerful factor in Europe.

"Although the German and Austrian Governments are responsible for the war, others bear an enormous responsibility for it as well.

"We must pay for the acts of our U-boats and for the breach of Belgian neutrality, but we have now overthrown the old regimé."

I have no faith whatever in the alleged change of government in Germany. I think it is camouflage. I think that Germany is simply pretending to undergo a change in government in order to try to fool the entente allies and the United States. It remains to be seen whether we and the entente allies can be fooled.

The German people have not changed one particle. Their nature, disposition, and spirit remain the same and will remain the same. The only safe course is to put them in such condition that it will be impossible for them ever to wage another war of inhumanity and bestiality against civilization. The people of a German republic would be just the same people as those of a German empire. I think they are changing their form of government or pretending to do so for the purpose of trying to escape liability for indemnity. They are, in my opinion, laying the groundwork to enable them to say after the treaty of peace is signed, and when indemnity is demanded of them for the United States, Great Britain, Belgium, France, and Italy, "Why, we owe you nothing. This is not the government that had the war. This is not the government that inflicted that damage, spoliation, and ruination. This is not the government that caused your war cost. This is another government altogether. We have nothing to do with those things. The government that owes you money has passed out of existence. It can not pay you anything. There is nobody from whom to collect."

It is a good deal like a firm of merchants, "Jones & Smith," who might buy $100,000 worth of goods on credit and simply change the name of the firm to "Jones & Smith Mercantile Co.," a corporation, and who, when the creditors demand their money for the goods, say to the creditors, "This is not the firm that bought your goods. We do not owe you anything. This is a different firm. The firm may be composed of the same people, but it is a different firm altogether." I think that is the kind of trick the German people are trying to play on the United States and the entente allies.

Germany should be made to feel that she is a vanquished nation and must pay for all the harm she has done. Not only is Germany unrepentant, but Germany has endured no great amount of real suffering as yet. Germany has not suffered one iota of what the people of France, Belgium, and Italy have suffered. I do not believe the people of Germany have suffered the privation and hardship that the people of Great Britain have suffered, because Germany has looted all her neighbors and kept herself rich and fat in food and spoils. Germany is now calling upon the people of this country to feed her people, to send them food. I do not believe there is any necessity for any such appeal. I think they have two motives in making this appeal. First, they think that every dollar's worth of food that they get out of the United States will keep that much food from going to the starving, suffering people of France and Belgium and will cause a few more women and babies to starve to death in France and Belgium, and that they will in that way accomplish still further their nefarious purposes and gratify their hatred of France and Belgium. They think, furthermore, I believe, if they can beg food of us and make us believe they are starving we will be easy with them in regard to terms of settlement. That, in my opinion, is what is behind their appeal for food. They just harvested a crop in the fall, and I am satisfied they have sufficient food to answer their needs until spring. That has been ascertained by people who have investigated their condition, their stores of food and sources of supply. I have a few newspaper clippings on that score, a few of many, and here submit them, as follows:

LONDON, January 4.

While the Ebert government in Berlin is proclaiming that Germany is facing a famine and is appealing for a modification of the armistice conditions, official evidence is at hand that at least a large part of the fatherland is as well off, if not better, than are the allied peoples. A member of the allied naval commission in German waters in an article in the Times says:

"The German Government and the press, from the moment the ink was dry on the armistice signatures, made a concerted appeal for food on the ground that otherwise great numbers faced imminent, certain starvation. This even went the length of a call from the womanhood of Germany to their sisters in France and England to intercede in behalf of the dying children of the fatherland. In response to this appeal, comprehensive plans for revictualing those parts of Germany actually in need of food has been part of the allied program ever since the signing of the armistice.

"It would be absurd to draw conclusions on conditions in all parts of a country like Germany from those observed in one region, however extensive, and that I am not endeavoring to do. I am confining myself in detailing what the various members of the allied naval commission saw with their own eyes in a very considerable area of northwestern Germany, over which their work of inspection took them.

"But if the food conditions in the rest of Germany are not much worse than in Oldenburg, Mecklenburg, and Schleswig-Holstein there certainly is no need for haste on the part of the allies going to their relief.

"Members of various subcommissions of the allied naval commission, who covered many hundreds of miles of country and saw tens of thousands of people at close range, reported having noticed no evidence of underfeeding among any of the inhabitants. Indeed, they are of the unanimous opinion that the population, urban and rural, are fed near enough to normal requirements to keep them full of physical vigor.

"As a member of the intelligence staff, who passed many years in the country before the war, put it, 'You don't see so many people with rolls of fat on them as five years ago, but you do see a healthier, hardier, and generally more fit-looking population.'

"The results of a really bountiful harvest are seen in bulging barns and sheds, plethoric haystacks and fodder piles. The surest evidence of an oversupply of vegetables was the careless way in which cabbages, potatoes, and beets were handled in transport.

"A starving people does not leave food of this kind to rot along the roads nor in station yards, while in journeys through Oldenburg I saw endless evidence not only of intensive cultivation but also of careful, scientific fertilization.

"There is clear proof that the supply of artificial fertilizers—phosphates besides nitrates and lime—was fairly well maintained. Trucks on the station siding showed that, so did the State fields; for fresh young winter wheat, which I saw everywhere, was pushing up, taking full advantage of this mild winter weather and showed no trace of the hungriness I have noted for the last year or two in some overcropped, underfertilized fields in England.

"The people thereabouts are Danish, but are producing a huge supply of good food—enough to keep the people in less fertile regions far from want."

According to estimates made by intelligence officers of the American Third Army after an investigation, it appears that in the area occupied by the American troops the cities and towns have enough of most foods to last during the winter and the country districts have enough to carry them through the spring.

LONDON, November 25.

The Cologne Gazette of November 16 published an article under the caption "Armistice and the food supply," written by a specialist named Oetelshofen, who argued that there could be no question of a shortage of food in Germany, but that it was urgently necessary to reduce rations.

The writer maintained that Germany could deal with the transport problem by readjustments, reducing the transport of potatoes and vegetables and confining the transport facilities to foods of greater nutritive value in proportion to their bulk. He advocated the killing of pigs in particular, the abolition of the rationing of sugar, and the restriction of railway consignments to distances of over 150 miles to consignments of corn, sugar, live cattle, meat, fats, poultry, eggs, and cheese.

Dealing with the harvest, Oetelshofen estimated the bread-corn harvest, apart from barley and oats, at not less than 12,000,000 tons and the potato harvest at about 47,500,000 tons.

The writer points out that Germany must have an abundance of sugar, because most of the German sugar hitherto had been used as raw material for munitions, and Germany now had a sugar harvest of about 1,808,000 tons, as compared with a peace consumption of only 1,200,000 tons. He said the potato supply also must benefit from the fact that it no longer was necessary to extract spirits from potatoes for munition purposes.

"Even after the armistice," the writer said, "there is abundance of food in Germany for feeding the population if we reduce the consumption by animals by reducing the stocks of cattle. It is to be expected that food prices will soon fall sharply. The public can contribute to this end if it will avoid hoarding of supplies and wait for cheaper prices."

LONDON, December 17.

The correspondent in Berlin of the Daily Express, dealing with the return of the German Army, says the scenes of enthusiasm marking the home-coming of the troops are ending.

"Men have been coming home at the rate of 10,000 a day," says the correspondent. "Every day Herr Ebert, the chancellor, takes his place on a rostrum opposite the French embassy. He addresses the home-coming men, and the bands play martial music, while the crowds cheer and wave their handkerchiefs.

"'Deutschland uber alles' brought me into the street this morning. To my amazement—and to the apparent amazement of the French officers, grouped in the window of the embassy—a regiment was passing the Brandenburg gate to the old tune. Later I heard it played continuously as cavalry, infantry, and artillery swept by. Regimental flags were crowned with laurel wreaths. The men wore evergreens around their steel helmets, and their tunics and guns were covered with flowers.

"What particularly struck me was the attitude of the home-coming officers. Those I have seen in the Berlin garrison were quiet men, many of whom had removed their marks of rank. They seldom were saluted by their men. On the other hand, the troops just returned from the front are well-disciplined and saluted as of old. The officers themselves are unchanged. They exhibit themselves, monocled and tight waisted, to the population, who cheer them loudly.

FIFTY CABARETS ARE OPEN.

"Berlin is dancing mad. There are about 50 cabarets in the city and dancing goes on all the afternoon and until 9 o'clock at night. In a week's time the edict closing dancing halls at 9 o'clock will be removed and dancing then will continue all night. Berliners are looking forward to this. It is a remarkable sight to see cabarets packed to suffocation with women in expensive toilets and both soldiers and civilians dancing and drinking wine costing £2 a bottle. Seats at the theaters can only be booked two days ahead.

"'We are trying to forget,' said a Berliner to me to-day."

Here is a clipping which shows something of conditions in German Austria:

GERMAN AUSTRIA'S FIRST LOAN.

ZURICH, December 29.

According to the Vienna Neue Freie Presse, German Austria's first loan has been highly successful. The subscriptions will close December 31. Nearly 600,000,000 crowns had been subscribed by December 24, or more than 100,000,000 crowns over the total asked for.

If they can subscribe so liberally to their first governmental loan, they are not short of food, and they can pay indemnity for some of the damage done by them.

Germany has not suffered anything like the people of the Confederate States suffered during the Civil War in this country, nor anything like the people of the Southern States of the Union suffered during the reconstruction times after the close of the Civil War. They have not been made to feel the spirit of agony; they have not been made to feel the cruel hand of privation, denial, and suffering for the actual necessities of life, such as the people of the South felt during the Civil War in this country. Germany must be made to suffer before she will be repentant. Germany must be made to feel the stern force of power before the brute spirit in her will experience any of the suffering she so richly merits.

The Civil War in this country was waged upon a principle between honorable people, to settle a disputed question which could only be settled by the arbitrament of the sword; but the war that Germany waged was waged from a spirit of lustful bestiality, greed, spoliation, hatred. It was a war based on every bad trait in human nature.

Germany has now substituted cunning, trickery, deception, audacity for force. Her audacity is appalling. There are evidences that Germany is even looking to the people of this country for protection from her crimes, looking to us to make it easy for Germany in the settlement of the terms of peace. I hope there is no foundation for any such expectation on her part and that no such humiliation will ever come to the people of the United States. I have seen it stated in newspapers that the people of Germany expect the vile and unspeakable Bernstorff to be one of their delegates, and that he is expected to sit at the table in the peace conference. I see from the newspapers that Germany is preparing to send a delegation and retinue of 100 people to represent the cause of Germany at the peace conference. I hope that none of them, especially Bernstorff, will be permitted to sit at the peace table. If Bernstorff should offer to take a seat at the peace table, it would be an insult to the people of this country; and in such event I hope that our delegation would protest, and if their protest were unavailing, they would be justified in leaving the peace conference. Here is a newspaper clipping which tells of Germany's audacious preparations for the peace conference:

LONDON, January 7.

Preparations for the peace conference are being concluded by the German ministers, and an enormous number of documents have been made ready, according to the Amsterdam correspondent of the Daily Express. These will be taken to Paris by the German peace delegates and their staff, which, including secretaries and assistants, number about 100.

It has been arranged, says the correspondent, that every ministry shall be represented by at least one official of first rank. The foreign office will be in full force, with Count von Brockdorff-Rentzau, the foreign minister, at the head and possibly with Carl Kautsky and Dr. Edoard David, socialists, and Eduard Bernstein, independent socialist, as first advisers.

Among the colonial experts who are to be sent to Paris the names of Dr. Solf and Dr. Dernburg are mentioned, while the ministry of mercantile marine will be represented by the late Herr Ballin's successor, Herr Heinecken; the ministry of commerce by Dr. Rathenau, president of the General Electric Co. Count von Roedern, the former governor of Alsace-Lorraine, may attend in behalf of the ministry of finance, as he now holds the post of secretary of the imperial treasury, and may be accompanied by Adolf Wermuth, burgomaster of Berlin, while Mathias Erzburger, who was one of the delegates to the armistice conference, is likely to join in the deliberations as expert on the league of nations.

The name of Germany's first plenipotentiary has not yet been divulged, but many believe that he will be Prince Lichnowsky, the former ambassador at London, who exposed German culpability in the war, although his appointment would be distasteful to the "red" government.

I submit these things, shocking as they are, because I believe they should be considered by our people. They should be known. I believe in plain words. It will not hurt to know the facts, shocking as they are. Germany must be fixed for all time to come if the world is to be safe. Now is the time, and the peace conference is the instrumentality to do it.

I contend that none of the central powers should be permitted to be represented at the peace conference, that none of them should be permitted to join the league of nations. They are all criminals and unfit for association with civilized and law-abiding nations.

Russia should not be permitted to take part in the peace conference; she should not be permitted to join the league of nations. Russia is the poltroon and slacker of the nations of the earth. This war was fought largely for the preservation of Russia. When Austria declared war on little Serbia, Russia came to the rescue of Serbia and declared war on Austria, and said it would not permit a large nation to destroy a small and helpless nation. Germany then declared war on Russia; and if Great Britain, France, Italy, and the United States had not gone into the war and sided with Russia, if they had not come to the rescue of Russia, the war would not have lasted six weeks. Russia would have been destroyed and annihilated; she would have been wiped off the face of the earth, and would not to-day be in existence; the Russians would have been made slaves and serfs of Germany; but Great Britain, France, and Italy went to the rescue of Russia, and yet, in the moment of their dire distress, in the moment of the greatest distress of the nations that went to the rescue of Russia, to save her from total annihilation, she lay down and betrayed them to their enemies. After having entered into a solemn obligation not to make a separate peace she made a separate peace with Germany and betrayed her associates to the common enemy.

She made a peace with Germany that was infamous and slavish, devoid of every instinct of manhood, honor, and integrity. A nation of that kind is not fit to be in a league of nations; it can not be trusted to be in a league of nations.

I contend that only the nations that are civilized and are disposed to do what is right should be admitted to the league of nations. The object of a league of nations is to make all nations of the world do what is right, just as the object of organized society is to make all subjects of organized society do what is right. The law-abiding people of a community form organized society, and their object is to make those who are not law-abiding obey the mandates of those who are law-abiding. They proceed to do so in well-administered governments by enforcing law and order. The society of the nations of the world should be on the same plane and basis. The nations which are law-abiding should undertake to force those who are not law-abiding to be law-abiding and to respect the rights of others; but you are not going to do that by admitting lawless nations into full fellowship in organized society for the enforcement of law, and you are not going to do it by taking criminal nations by the hand and inviting them to an equal voice in the deliberations and powers of a league of nations.

I do not believe that the time will come in this generation when Germany or any of its component parts or any of the central powers or Russia will be fit or worthy to be in a league of nations. They must go through a process of total regeneration and reconstruction and must learn different ideas. Different principles must be instilled into the hearts of their people. They must have stable governments erected on the ruins of their old unworthy governments; they must be conducted not for purposes of robbery and spoliation but for the purpose of upholding and respecting the rights of all nations. It may take years and years of time for that to be brought about in the case of the central powers and of Russia.

A league of nations should be organized for the welfare of all mankind, to uphold the right and to punish the wrong. In doing that, so far as Germany is concerned, the first undertaking should be to teach Germany that might is not right, but that right is might. That is what Germany needs to be taught—that right is might, that right is power, and that right will prevail. Until Germany is taught that lesson Germany must be kept down by the other nations of the world where it will be impossible for her to do any wrong or to create any consternation in the world.

I believe in extending mercy and generosity to people, even to those who are in the wrong, and even to criminals, when they show that they are repentant and are worthy of mercy and generosity. That is the spirit of the Christian religion; but it teaches that forgiveness must only be expected by those who are repentant and not by those who persist in continuing in wicked careers of wrong. The same principle should be applied to the nations of the world. It is the only sound principle. It is sound in religion, in civilization, in ethics, and in all the other elevating influences of mankind. It is sound in individual life, it is sound in the internal affairs of nations, and it ought to be sound in the international affairs of nations. People who do wrong must be punished; nations which do wrong must be punished until they are repentant, acknowledge their wrongs, and give evidence of their disposition to do what is right.

I have been asked my idea of a league of nations. My idea of a league of nations is that its principal object should be to compel the nations of the central powers, Russia, and all other nations not disposed to do right to do right, to observe the rights of mankind, and to maintain a well-balanced world of right and justice. The principal object of a league of nations should be to enforce justice, to see that justice prevails in the world of nations. Right now a part of its work would be to keep Germany and her allies and Russia in such a position that they will be incapable of doing any wrong to any people. In order to do that, I think a league of nations should be comprised at the beginning of those nations that constitute the entente allies and the United States. That would be a good beginning. An incipient league of nations is already formed. Let them continue their cooperation in the interest of justice and the enforcement of right in the world and the righting of wrongs.

I would have admitted further to the league of nations such neutral nations as have evinced a disposition to be right and to do right during the war which has just come to a close. I would not admit any nation, such as Spain, which plainly sympathized with Germany. I would have such a league composed of the nations of the entente allies and the United States and such neutral nations as have proven by their conduct that they wanted to do the right, and will do right in the future. When that kind of a league of nations is formed, if it will prescribe proper rules and enforce them, it will be impossible for any other nation, no matter of what strength or power, ever to run amuck in this civilized world, as Germany has done. As other nations become regenerate and repentant and show a disposition to do right, I would favor taking them into the league of nations under such securities and binding restrictions as seem proper, and testing them; take them in on trial. If they prove true to their professions, let them remain, and in time all of the civilized nations will be in a league of nations and will be pledged to resist any attempt to launch another world-wide war of ruination, spoliation, and criminal aggression.

As to other terms and conditions of a league of nations, such a league I think should be perfected cautiously, and after due deliberation and great care. Precautions should be taken not to encroach unduly upon the sovereignty of any of the nations of the league. Such a league should really be defensive instead of offensive; a league of nations designed to defend the world against criminal aggression instead of launching warfare against nations not in the league. It seems to me it should largely be a mutual organization for defense. If comprised of the leading civilized nations of the earth, the real powers of the world, leaders in righteousness and high standards, and if backed by an enlightened sentiment and abhorrence of wrong, I think it would need little force to attain its ends. No nation would dare defy it. A repetition of the crime of Germany would be impossible, unthinkable. May it so be.

CONDITIONS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I had intended to-day to submit some observations to the Senate upon conditions in Russia and the attitude which this Government should occupy regarding that country. I do not care to enter upon a discussion of so important a topic at this late hour, and therefore shall not attempt to do so until to-morrow, when, if occasion offers, I shall have something to say upon the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire his observation noted that he will address the Senate to-morrow?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, Mr. President, although the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] contemplates addressing the Senate upon a kindred subject, and I have no desire to interfere with him.

THE CENSUS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill for the purpose of amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Census was, in section 1, on page 1, at the beginning of line 4, to insert "forestry and forest products," so as to make the section read:

That a census of the population, agriculture, manufactures, forestry and forest products, and mines and quarries of the United States shall be taken by the Director of the Census in the year 1920 and every 10 years thereafter. The census herein provided for shall include each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. A census of Guam and Samoa shall be taken in the same year by the respective governors of said islands and a census of the Panama Canal Zone by the governor of the Canal Zone in accordance with plans prescribed or approved by the Director of the Census.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 18, on page 2.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, on page 2, line 18, I move to substitute the word "ten" for the word "fifteen." The director has found that he can get along with 10 statisticians instead of 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 2, line 18, before the words "statistical experts," it is proposed to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten," so as to read:

SEC. 3. That during the decennial census period, and no longer, there may be employed in the Census Office, in addition to the force provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year immediately preceding the decennial census period, an assistant director, who shall be an experienced practical statistician; a chief statistician, who shall be a person of known and tried experience in statistical work; a disbursing clerk; an appointment clerk; a private secretary to the director; 4 stenographers, 8 expert chiefs of division; and 10 statistical experts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do.

Mr. KING. I remember some little discussion—I have forgotten whether it was in the committee or outside of the committee—with respect to the provision in line 18 for eight expert chiefs of division, in the same line as the amendment suggested a moment ago. My recollecton is that there was some discussion, in which it was contended that the Director of the Census could get along with six instead of eight. Does the Senator recall whether it was deemed necessary to adhere to this number?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the director put before us a statement showing that he would need these eight expert chiefs of divisions during the decennial census period.

Mr. KING. Yes; I recall that. While I am on my feet, will the Senator from Texas advise the Senate how long that period will cover?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It will cover three years, beginning June 30 of this year, and within those three years this bill requires that the census shall not only be taken but that all reports shall be formulated, presented, and published for distribution.

I shall state further to the Senator that the additional force required during the decennial census period will cover a field force of something like eighty-five or ninety thousand enumerators, about twelve hundred special agents, 400 supervisors, and an additional office force in Washington of from one to five thousand employees.

Mr. KING. My recollection is that there was some discussion as to the necessity of continuing the number of the higher-priced employees for the full period of three years. I will ask the Senator whether, upon full hearing, it was concluded that they were required for that entire period?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That seemed to be the situation.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, it seemed to me from the evidence that was adduced at the hearings and from some investigation which I made outside of the hearings that they would not be required for so long a period; but, if the director insists that their services will be needed for that period, I shall not make any objection.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, perhaps the chairman of the committee gave the information, but I was unable to hear the discussion between him and the Senator from Utah; so I inquire if the Senator can tell the Senate how many assistants the present law provides for?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I can give the Senator that information. The existing law under which the Thirteenth Census was taken provides for practically the same number of supervisory assistants as does the present bill; there is very little change in this respect.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator another question? As I understand, these appointments are additional to the appointments provided for in the legislative appropriation bill. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill provides only for the force covered by the permanent census act, some 600 employees and the supervisory officials, who are all permanent. This bill is practically a reenactment of the law providing for the thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, with only such changes as were found by experience to be necessary in the interest of prompt and efficient census taking. The appointees it authorizes continue during the three-year decennial census period and no longer.

Mr. GRONNA. The service of these appointees will be at an end, I take it, on the conclusion of the taking of the census?

Mr. SHEPPARD. At the conclusion of the decennial census period, which covers the three years from June 30 of this year.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, at some point, perhaps not now, in the consideration of the bill, I should like to have the Senator state what changes have been found necessary and what additions have been made over the extra force provided for the Thirteenth Census.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall be glad to give the Senator that information now. In this section the only addition is 15 statistical experts; and the director has found since this bill was reported to the Senate that he can do the work with 10 statistical experts. That is the only addition, so far as this section is concerned, over the act providing for the Thirteenth Census.

Mr. WARREN. Then this bill is exactly like the law of 10 years ago with that change?

Mr. SHEPPARD. With that change, and with the further change that four stenographers are provided, instead of two under the Thirteenth Census law; the section under consideration is the same law of 10 years ago. The other sections can be explained as we come to them.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Census was, on page 3, line 2, after the word "Provided," to strike out:

That no man appointed or employed or who shall hereafter be appointed or employed under this act shall on account of such employment be certified by any official or authority for deferred classification under act No. 12, Sixty-fifth Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, or under any act amendatory thereof that has been or shall hereafter be enacted: Provided further.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall state that the necessity for that provision has passed, in view of the fact that fighting has ceased and the draft process is no longer in operation. This language prevented the exemption of employees in the Census Office from the draft on the ground that they would be needed in an essential occupation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Secretary read as follows, beginning on line 12, page 3:

That whenever practicable women and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors shall be employed in the positions herein provided for.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not, under the provision just read by the Secretary, being found in lines 12, 13, and 14, on page 3, it is intended that soldiers and sailors shall be employed whenever practicable, regardless of the civil-service law?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not think so. I would accept an amendment making that clearer, if the Senator desires.

Mr. KING. The Senator thinks that language is clear, that they must be under the civil service?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is my construction.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, as to that, if it is of any consequence that they should be exempt from the civil-service law, while I question the propriety of such a provision in a statute, it certainly can not mean much if those who are supposed to be favored must nevertheless come from the classified service, since on the lists they will be certified and have to take their chances. I think, too, that it would be well to amend it by inserting the word "men" after the word "practicable," so that it will read:

That whenever practicable, men, women, and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors shall be employed in the positions herein provided for.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, this provision is not in the existing law. It was inserted on the floor of the House, and really the comment of the Senator from Colorado is to a great extent justified. It is difficult to see how any particular meaning can be attached to it. I suggest that we allow it to remain, however, as it passed the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is the Senator having the bill in charge quite sure that the amendment that was just agreed to, striking out, beginning with the word "That," on line 2, down to and including the word "further," on line 12, has reference only to the Military Establishment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is my understanding.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply want to reserve the right, before the bill is passed, to look up what the "deferred classification under act numbered 12, Sixty-fifth Congress," really has reference to.

Mr. THOMAS. It is the conscript law.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought so.

Mr. THOMAS. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. If it has reference to anything further than merely the conscript law, then of course I shall want a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is entirely satisfactory.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Census was, in section 5, page 4, line 10, after the word "Census," to strike out "$7,000" and insert "$7,500," so as to read:

That during the decennial census period the annual compensation of the officials of the Census Office shall be as follows: The Director of the Census, $7,500;

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if in past census bills there has been an increase in the compensation of the Director of the Census over and above the compensation that he regularly receives?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That has been the case during the last two censuses, to my knowledge.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator say that in the last two censuses the Director of the Census has received $7,500 a year?

Mr. SHEPPARD. During the decennial census period of the Twelfth Census he received $7,500; during that of the Thirteenth Census he received $7,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator remember what he receives ordinarily?

Mr. SHEPPARD. As a permanent thing, $6,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That was my recollection.

Mr. WARREN. Six thousand dollars was the old salary.

Mr. SHEPPARD. There is an enormous increase in his duties and responsibilities during the decennial census period. He has something like eighty-five or ninety thousand people under him, and he really faces a critical task; and during the last two decennial census periods he has been allowed a substantial increase. I shall state that a few moments ago I submitted an amendment to section 3 diminishing the number of statisticians originally suggested from 15 to 10, which would mean a saving of $10,000. That $10,000 would more than cover the increases which we ask for some of the supervisory officials during the decennial census period.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that the salaries that the Senate committee has reported are altogether out of proportion to the salaries that are paid other heads of divisions and bureaus of the Government; and I do not believe we ought to go to the extreme at this particular time. I believe that the salaries provided for in the House bill are ample.

I will ask the Senator if he will not allow the amendments in section 5 to go over for the present, because I understand the Senator wants the bill to be read to-day, and does not expect it to be passed to-day; and then we can refer to the matter when we have the bill before the Senate again.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask that the amendments in section 5 go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments in section 5 will be passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. And the same thing as to the salaries in section 6, because the same subject matter will be discussed then.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I make the same request as to section 6, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments in section 6 will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed, beginning on page 5, line 21.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Census was, in section 7, page 5, line 24, after the word "prescribe," to strike out "the said" and insert "subject to the approval of the United States Civil Service Commission, these," so as to read:

That the additional clerks and other employees provided for by section 6 shall be subject to such special test examinations as the Director of the Census may prescribe, subject to the approval of the United States Civil Service Commission, these examinations to be conducted by the United States Civil Service Commission, to be open to all applicants, without regard to political party affiliations, and to be held at such places in each State as may be designated by the Civil Service Commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The purpose of this amendment was to bring the additional clerks in the office force here in Washington clearly within the civil-service rules. The Civil Service Commission insisted upon it, and the National League for Civil Service Reform urged it.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Census was, on page 6, line 8, after the word "service," to insert "and selections therefrom shall be made by the Director of the Census," so as to read:

Certifications shall be made by the Civil Service Commission upon request of the Director of the Census from the eligible registers so established, in conformity with the law of apportionment as now provided for the classified service, and selections therefrom shall be made by the Director of the Census in the order of rating.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 14, after the word "the," to strike out "Census Office" and insert "Government service," so as to read:

Provided further, That hereafter all examinations of applicants for positions in the Government service from any State or Territory shall be had in the State or Territory in which such applicant resides, and no person shall be eligible for such examination or appointment unless he or she shall have been actually domiciled in such State or Territory for at least one year previous to such examination.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas whether it is wise to strike out, in line 14, the words "Census Office" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Government service"? It seems to me that if that is done we shall be extending the operation of this bill into a broader and wider field.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I shall state to the Senator that that amendment simply restores the language of the existing Thirteenth Census law. The existing law uses the term "Government service," and it seems to have been the only existing authority for the examination of employees in all the different departments in the States of their residence. If this were stricken out the commission would be left without authority in that regard. It seems the Thirteenth Census act was utilized in the first instance for general legislation to this extent. The House struck out the words "Government service" and inserted "Census Office," and the fact has since been brought to our attention that unless we restore the words "Government service" the Civil Service Commission will be without the general authority that they now possess in the respect I have mentioned.

Mr. KING. The Senator means with respect to those who may be employed under the provisions of this act?

Mr. SHEPPARD. And all other acts.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether there is not an existing law which provides for the time, place, and method of examining those who are applicants for positions under the civil service?

Mr. SHEPPARD. There is, but authority for examination in the State of residence is found only in the act for the Thirteenth and subsequent censuses.

Mr. KING. And there is no general statute with relation to that?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is my understanding.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understand, the general law authorizes the Civil Service Commission to conduct examinations for positions in the Government service. If we provide simply for the Census Office in this bill, there is no special law giving the authority to examine any particular person for any one department, but it is general. Therefore this should be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Census was, on page 6, line 21, after the word "Commission," to strike out "may" and insert "shall"; in the same line, after the word "examinations," to strike out "for positions in such service"; in line 22, after the word "the," to strike out "place" and insert "places"; in line 25, after the word "held," to insert a comma; on page 7, line 1, after the word "such," to strike out "applicant is a" and insert "applicants are"; in the same line, after the words "bona fide," to strike out "resident" and insert "residents"; in line 2, after the word "the," to strike out "State or Territory" and insert "State or Territories"; in the same line, after the word "such," to strike out "applicant claims to have a" and insert "applicants claim to have"; in line 5, after the word "law," to strike out "or" and insert "of"; and in line 11, after the word "physician," to strike out "And provided further, That in no instance shall more than one person be appointed from the same family," so as to read:

Provided further, That the Civil Service Commission shall hold examinations of applicants temporarily absent from the places of their legal residence or domicile in the District of Columbia and elsewhere in the United States where examinations are usually held, upon proof satisfactory to the commission that such applicants are bona fide residents of the State or Territories in which such applicants claim to have legal residence or domicile: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to abridge the existing law of apportionment or change the requirements of existing law as to legal residence or domicile of such applicants: And provided further, That no person afflicted with tuberculosis shall be appointed and that each applicant for appointment shall accompany his or her application with a certificate of health from some reputable physician.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it seems to me there is a grammatical inaccuracy in the amendment on line 2 of page 7. It is a comparatively small matter. The words "State or Territory" are stricken out and the words "State," singular, and "or Territories," plural, are inserted in place thereof. Now, if conformity with the word "residents" requires the plural of "Territory," it should also require the plural of "State."

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is correct, and I hope he will offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the House provision is the better of the two; but inasmuch as that would require other amendments, I move to make the word "State" on line 2 "States."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 2, it is proposed to strike out "State or Territory" and insert in lieu thereof "States or Territories."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the chairman of the committee to lines 23, 24, and 25 on page 7, and lines 1 to 8, inclusive, on page 8, reading as follows:

And provided further, That employees in other branches of the departmental classified service who have had previous experience in census work may be transferred without examination to the Census Office to serve during the whole or a part of the decennial census period, and at the end of such service the employees so transferred shall be eligible to appointment to positions in any department held by them at date of transfer to the Census Office without examination; but no employee so transferred shall within one year after such transfer receive higher salary than he is receiving at the time of the transfer.

Complaint has been made to me as a member of the committee that under the provisions of this section the Director of the Census would have authority to employ one or more persons who formerly had been in the Census Bureau. The claim is made that there are a number of incompetent persons available who are very desirous of obtaining these positions, or, to speak very plainly, who are waiting around here for these jobs, and that it is unfair to give them the preference, such as it is claimed this language would give them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. This language authorizes a transfer from other departments.

Mr. KING. Yes; but the contention is that there are persons who are incompetent, and who are now in other branches of the service, who are anxious to be transferred to the Census Bureau, and that this will enable that to be done without their taking the civil-service examination, notwithstanding their incompetency. Complaint has been made to me that it will be the means of giving positions in the Census Bureau to incompetents, some of whom have some sort of a "pull," and who are or will be pets of the chiefs of divisions and those who hold responsible positions in the bureau. Very serious objection has been made to me in regard to the provision to which I have just called attention.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not believe that the present Director of the Census would be guilty of action of that kind. I believe the Senator from Utah can rest assured of that fact. Besides, the Senator will observe that no increase in salary can be had within a year after the transfer.

Mr. KING. I promised to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the complaint which has been made to me with respect to the evils which it is alleged will grow out of the situation if the bill is enacted in its present form.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Secretary read to line 21, page 8.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, at the end of section 7 I wish to submit an amendment, reading as follows:

And provided further, That in the selection of the additional clerks and employees provided for by section 6 the director is authorized to use, so far as practicable, the reemployment registers established by Executive order of November 29, 1918.

I offer that amendment, to come in at the end of line 20, page 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 7, on page 8, line 20, after the word "act," it is proposed to insert the following:

And provided further, That in the selection of the additional clerks and employees provided for by section 6, the director is authorized to use, so far as practicable, the reemployment registers established by Executive order of November 29, 1918.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like the Senator to explain that amendment to me, as my attention was diverted while it was being read.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, before the Senator begins, I should like to know why these people who have been employed in the service up to now should be given any preference in the opportunity to work for the Government hereafter, as against people who have not enjoyed that privilege.

Mr. SHEPPARD. They do not have a preference.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand they are directed by the proposed amendment to use this register.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not at all. The director is authorized to use them as far as practicable. I shall say to the Senator from Utah that the amendment was offered at the request of the Civil Service Commission. A number of employees for whom employment could no longer be found were put on reemployment registers by the Civil Service Commission, and the commission thought that they might profitably and justly be used by the director if he saw fit; and that is why I offered the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me that under the section itself he has that power; and I do not see why you should put this amendment in, virtually directing him to do so.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It does not direct him. If it does, the amendment does not correspond with my intention. It simply authorizes him to do it.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator suppose that if the authority is given it will not be exercised?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is intended that he shall exercise it in so far as may be practicable.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think we need quarrel over phraseology, then. The commission will exercise it all right.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator means, the Director of the Census will exercise it?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I mean that as I understand the amendment, it authorizes the Director of the Census to use lists which have been prepared heretofore by the Civil Service Commission. The latter will see that he uses them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Let me read the letter from the Civil Service Commission, so that it can go into the RECORD:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., December 30, 1918.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Chairman Committee on the Census.
United States Senate.

SIR: In anticipation of legislation providing for the Fourteenth Decennial Census, the commission has the honor to bring to your attention the inclosed copy of an Executive order promulgated by the President on November 29, 1918, which provides for the reemployment registers to be made up of the names of persons in the competitive classified civil service with unrestricted status who were appointed prior to the date of the order, who have served less than three years, who are separated from the service because of a reduction of force, and who are recommended for further employment by the Government because of demonstrated efficiency in the office from which they are separated.

It seems probable that at the time when work will begin on the census the reemployment registers resulting from the procedure authorized in the Executive order will contain names in excess of the needs of the service. As a matter of economy, the commission suggests that when the census bill is framed consideration be given to the matter of making use of eligibles on the reemployment registers for filling positions in connection with the census. These persons have been tested by examinations and have won permanent appointments by competition, and lose their positions only because of necessary reduction of force. Their experience acquired in the Government service would make them of more value to the Census Office than inexperienced employees. A provision in the census act suggesting or directing that these registers be used as far as possible would seem likely to be of benefit to the Government service and a merited recognition of the worth of these employees, who lose their positions through no fault of their own.

The commission will be glad to furnish more detailed information concerning the reemployment registers upon request.

By direction of the commission:

Very respectfully,

CHAS. M. GALLOWAY,
Acting President.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator understand that they are on the permanent roll now or simply on the waiting list?

Mr. SHEPPARD. They are on the permanent eligible roll of the commission.

Mr. SMOOT. I would want to know that that was the case before I could agree to the amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator means whether they are in the service now?

Mr. SMOOT. No; they have been in the service.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; they have been in the service.

Mr. SMOOT. But the letter does not show that they are on the permanent roll. They may be simply on the waiting list. If that is the case, I do not think we ought to put them ahead of those who may take the civil-service examinations hereafter, but if they are on the permanent roll and have been discharged then it seems to me, of course, this provision should be adopted.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Let me read the Executive order:

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

The names of persons in the competitive classified service with unrestricted status who were appointed, either permanently or probationally, prior to the date hereof, and who have served less than three years, and who are separated from the service because of a reduction of force, and who are recommended for further employment by the Government because of demonstrated efficiency in the office from which they are separated, will, upon request, be entered by the Civil Service Commission upon appropriate eligible registers for reappointment, eligibility thereon to continue for one year from date of separation.

Such reemployment registers will be separate and apart from the registers of the commission resulting from current examinations, and eligibility thereon and certifications and appointments therefrom shall in all respects conform to the usual practice and procedure, except that certifications of persons formerly in the apportioned service shall be made without regard to the apportionment.

The departments in making requisition on the commission for certifications of eligibles shall state whether they prefer certification to be made from a reemployment register or from a regular register of the commission.

It is desirable that the departments in making requisitions request certification from the reemployment registers so far as practicable, having in view the efficient performance of Government work.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 29, 1918.

Mr. SMOOT. From the reading of it I can not now tell whether that is an order covering them into the civil service. I ask the Senator to let the amendment go over, and I will see in the RECORD to-morrow the order, and then I will ask the Census Department as to whether they have been covered in or not.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the consideration of the amendment may go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the letter just read by the Senator from Texas, I wish to make an observation.

As I understand the communication, it is to the effect that those who have been in the service for some length of time and have been separated will probably render better service than those who have not been in the service.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Separated solely on account of a reduction of force and not through any fault of their own and who have personally demonstrated their efficiency.

Mr. KING. The theory seems to be the longer you are in the service the more efficient will your service be to the Government.

Mr. SHEPPARD. These have been in the service for less than three years, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. KING. The theory seems to be that length of service in the Government gives better qualification and makes one more efficient as an instrumentality for Government work.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Would not such a one be more efficient than one who had not been in the service?

Mr. KING. I think that is true.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Would not such a one have more experience than one who had not been in the service?

Mr. KING. It would give a longer time, at any rate.

Apropos of what the Senator has just read, I would like to state that information conveyed to me conveys a different story. As I understand the contention of the Senator, it is that length of service in the departments increases efficiency; that those who have been in the departments many years give better results to the Government. I have made some little inquiry, particularly during the past year, in the departments with a view to ascertaining the character of service rendered by employees. Recently two persons having control over, or the direction of, a large number of employees of the Government who are under the civil service, stated to me that there had been an improvement among old employees by reason of the new blood which the war had brought into the departments; that many of those recently given positions in the departments worked with such zeal, vigor, and efficiency that their example was contagious among older employees, and the result had been that the latter were doing better work than ever before. I doubt not but what this is the experience in other departments of the Government. Of course, there have been thousands of persons given positions in the departments since the war began who were incompetent and whose work, therefore, would be inefficient and unsatisfactory. The vast amount of work devolved upon some of the departments by reason of the war made imperative the calling of more persons into the departments.

Of course, if thoroughly competent employees could have been secured the number needed would have been very much less. But the point I wanted to make was that the persistent claim made by advocates of the civil service, that the civil service makes for efficiency and a higher standard of performance, is not quite supported by recent conditions. There is certainly much truth in the contention that under civil service the Government does not obtain the highest and best results. Many unbiased persons who have investigated the operation of the civil service in the United States and elsewhere have reached the conclusion that it makes for inefficiency and builds up a protected class who progressively become less efficient, a class who constantly claim greater privileges and higher rewards and seek preferences and advantages different from those in other activities of life.

It is not to be wondered at that the charges so often made that the civil-service plan is a delusion and a sham. Human nature is much the same in all ages and under all circumstances. If persons hold positions for life, the tendency is to perform work in a lackadaisical sort of manner. Particularly is this true where the work is of a clerical character or is of the same character from day to day and year to year. Persons so engaged lose initiative and self-reliance, and they drift into a mental attitude under which their work is performed in a more or less perfunctory manner. Buttressed behind law which makes it difficult, if not impossible, to remove or discharge them, the tendency is to become indifferent and autocratic. We find in our Government strong manifestations of the evils which have been recognized in bureaucratic governments. There is much truth in the charge that our Nation is becoming bureaucratic and is controlled by departments and bureaus and commissions and governmental agencies.

A Republican Senator of many years' service, after giving full consideration to this subject, did not hesitate to say that the work of the Government, if put in the hands of private individuals, could be performed at a saving of several hundred million dollars annually. The natural tendency is, as I have indicated, for employees who have a life tenure to drift into the ways of the bureaucratic, to claim special privileges, to constantly seek increased compensation with less service. There are thousands of men and women in the Government service whose work is of the highest order. There are thousands who are giving the best that is within them and who are entitled to the highest meed of praise. I know of men and women who are serving the Government whose qualifications are of so high an order that they could obtain important positions with corporations or private business concerns at a very much larger compensation. These persons are making a real sacrifice in remaining with the Government, and nothing that I have said is aimed at this class of Government employees. But there are thousands who fail to appreciate the duties and obligations resting upon them and do not give to the Government that devotion, energy, and honest service that they should. I do not know whether any different system can be employed to secure employees for governmental work. There is much to be said in favor of the civil-service plan. There are very strong arguments against it. Certainly its results have not been entirely satisfactory even to its most ardent friends and champions. I hope that some day a better system can be devised, a system that will secure better results and afford the Government better protection.

It is not only demoralizing for the service but it is demoralizing to individuals where inefficiency exists, and particularly if it is continuous and persistent. It is injurious to the character and ethical concepts of individuals if they render and are permitted to render inefficient service. A fair wage should be paid to employees, whether in the service of the Government or in the service of individuals, and a fair day's work should be given by the employee for such wage. The spirit of reciprocity should exist in Government service as well as in private service. Too many people seek positions with the Government because it is believed that the compensation is greater than for like service rendered to private persons or in private activities. There are some persons who feel that it is no offense to rob the Government. Accordingly we find many persons attempting to evade revenue laws. The same spirit exists among some who are in the employ of the Government. They are willing to receive the compensation provided by the Government, but they do not give an adequate return therefor. If civil service is to be continued, then there must be some adequate plan to secure proper and efficient service. Persons in the Government service have told me that many who are under them were incompetent and many were willfully inefficient, but that they did not feel like taking steps to secure their removal. If the present plan of securing Government employees is continued, then there must be some plan devised that will compel the indifferent and inefficient to discharge their duties and the incompetent to be separated from the service. I have had occasion to make inquiry concerning the activities of the Board of Efficiency. It has very great responsibilities resting upon it. The evils of which I have spoken will continue, and continue in an aggravated form, unless this board wields its power and authority with a stronger hand. I have sometimes thought that it was too tolerant and was not accomplishing what was intended when it was created.

Mr. THOMAS. Before the Senator takes his seat——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask the Senator whether the efficiency which he desires is not after all obtainable through congressional legislation. The Efficiency Commission can recommend, and if we do nothing with the recommendation it is we and not the commission who are to blame. I understand, and I think it is true, that the Efficiency Commission appointed by President Taft made a very elaborate report. The report came to Congress and like nearly all the reports of committees, it was the last we ever heard of it. I think the difficulty lies not so much with the efforts of the Efficiency Commission as with the ineptitude of Congress concerning their report. It is here and nowhere else that the work of reformation of these conditions must be effectuated.

Mr. KING. Of course, if Congress has been derelict in the discharge of its duty, I hope that fault will be remedied in the near future, but I have been of the opinion from the inquiries I have made that the Efficiency Board is not as active as it should be; at least if it is active the results are not entirely satisfactory.

There is one other matter I wish to mention, Mr. President, which I think conduces to inefficiency. Instead of promoting men because of efficiency and because of their earnestness in the discharge of their duties there is too much of a disposition to make promotions with reference to seniority or longevity in the service. As a result many very energetic and active men and women in the service of the Government are passed by in favor of less competent persons whose term of service has been much longer. I have had many complaints, because of the policy of recognizing length of service rather than effective service.

Mr. THOMAS. May I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. KING. I am very glad to be interrupted.

Mr. THOMAS. There again we set the example. Here seniority counts.

Mr. KING. In the Senate?

Mr. THOMAS. In the Senate, upon committees, and upon committees of conference. We must not blame the employees of the Government too much if they set their course by our illustrious example.

Mr. KING. Permit me to say in reply to the Senator that fortunately or unfortunately men are not selected for positions in the United States Senate under the civil-service rules.

Mr. THOMAS. Perhaps if they were we would have a more efficient Senate.

Mr. KING. That is possible.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to make this suggestion to my colleague. The Efficiency Board have been received with open arms by some of the departments of our Government. Certain departments have had them come in and recommend changes which have been adopted, but there are other departments of Government which simply will not have them enter their departments. I remember one case where they were virtually instructed to go in and did go into the department, but it never did any good because of the fact that the head of the department would not carry out the recommendations of the Efficiency Board. I have thought many times that it would be a very good thing if we had a board or commission of some kind clothed with authority to go in and rectify the glaring modes of carrying on business for the Government, and compel them to be changed. But there is no such authority yet given to any commission or board which we have created.

THE ROOSEVELT NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I have introduced a bill in this body, Senate bill 2021, which provides for the creation of a national park in California, to embrace the famous Kings River Canyon and groves of giant trees, admittedly the most surprising and wonderful stretches of the national domain, open to all the people at all seasons of the year for health, recreation, and æsthetic gratification. The amendment I now move provides that this area shall be, when created into a park, designated in honor of our late and beloved President, the Roosevelt National Park. I have consulted the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Franklin K. Lane; Stephen Mather, the Superintendent of National Parks; and Representative ELSTON, of California, who are all of one mind on this subject—that no more fit designation could be made.

Theodore Roosevelt was early identified with the West, and the west of the West. He sought among the great mountain ranges and the vast expanse of the prairie a field for his abounding energy. From his narrow environment of city streets and congested population he naturally sought expansion. The liberalizing influences of the western life nationalized him and prepared him doubtless for the larger tasks which he was destined to assume. I can not imagine a more fitting memorial for a man of his character, courage, culture, generous nature, and love of the beautiful than the rugged, wild, and sublime scenery embraced in the region of central California. The story of William Tell might apply with equal pertinency to Theodore Roosevelt, who learned his love of liberty from his love of nature. He, too, was influenced by the mountain streams which "plow the valleys without asking leave" and the mountain peaks which "wear their caps of snow in the very presence of the regal sun." Here are the King and Kern River canyons, Mount Whitney, the highest in the continental United States proper, and here in the crystal-pure waters, "never too grave to smile, too tired to run," disport the golden trout, peculiar to this place alone, and already bearing the scientific description of Salmo rooseveltl. There is no equal area on earth superior in natural wonders. It is bounded by the crests of the high Sierra; cataracts leap in glory from altitudinal clefts; giant trees lift their heads far above the besetting fog, erect amidst tempests, resplendent in the light of day, wreathed in immortelles, and serenely at rest in the free air of heaven. California—a State richly endowed by nature—can dedicate no finer monument to Roosevelt than this, the choicest of her natural gifts, nor the Nation a more appropriate memorial.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE CENSUS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In view of the lateness of the hour I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 14, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 13, 1919.

The House, under its previous order, met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, from whom proceedeth all things and to whom we are indebted for all the renewed blessings of life day by day, imbue us plenteously, we beseech Thee, with the riches of Thy grace that we may measure up to the highest aspirations of our own hearts and quit ourselves like men in the duties and responsibilities of the remaining hours of this day; and Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 11, 1919, was read and approved.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. ROUSE, on account of illness in his family.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. ROUSE. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, by unanimous consent (at request of Mr. VENABLE), was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness.

RATIFICATION OF PROHIBITION AMENDMENT IN MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received a communication from Gov. Sleeper, of Michigan, announcing the ratification of the prohibition amendment, which will be filed in the archives of the House.

RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my demand for a reading of the engrossed copy of the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his demand for reading of the engrossed copy of the river and harbor bill.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit with directions to report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FREAR offers the following motion to recommit:

"In addition to a balance of $45,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of War on January 1, 1919, for immediate expenditures on river and harbor work, the sum of $12,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor work, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation and most economical and advantageous in the execution of the work: Provided, That allotments from the amount hereby appropriated shall be made by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers. And provided further, That at the beginning of the next session of Congress a special report shall be made to Congress by the Secretary of War showing the amount allotted under this appropriation to each work of improvement."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is a motion to recommit subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I have an amendment to the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, pending the reading of the amendment, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMALL. The motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] purports to be a statement of fact regarding $45,000,000. My inquiry is whether that is appropriate in a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think there is anything obnoxious in this motion. I will suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin——

Mr. FREAR. If there is any question——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin never made any motion at all. This is a statement.

Mr. FREAR. I move to recommit, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SMALL. I move the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FREAR. I move to recommit.

The SPEAKER. I am stating to the gentleman that he has not moved to recommit.

Mr. FREAR. I made the motion on the floor to that extent.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman on the floor moved to recommit with instructions to report back forthwith with the amendment suggested.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, can it be reported again?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report it.

The motion to recommit was again reported.

Mr. SMALL. I move the previous question.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, if I may do so, I would like to add to that to strike out all after the enacting clause; that is, to make the motion.

The SPEAKER. What is it?

Mr. FREAR. To strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill as reported now to the House and to insert what appears here in the substitute amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FREAR moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"In addition to a balance of $45,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of War on January 1, 1919, for immediate expenditures in river and harbor work, the sum of $12,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor work and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation and most economical and advantageous in the execution of the work: Provided, That allotments from the amount hereby appropriated shall be made by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers: And provided further, That at the beginning of the next session of Congress a special report shall be made to Congress by the Secretary of War showing the amount allotted under this appropriation to each work of improvement."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put that motion in a minute. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to amend the motion to recommit as follows: At the end of said instruction add "And said committee are further instructed"; and at the end of the bill add the following new section:

"SEC. 5. The Chief of Engineers shall at the earliest date practicable report whether the various projects provided for in this bill are now deemed of urgent national importance, and no item of appropriation herein provided for shall become available until the same shall have been reported by the Chief of Engineers as of urgent national importance."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Blanton amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays, and I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Are you going to do both things at once?

Mr. FREAR. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of no quorum. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 91, nays 203, answered "present" 4, not voting 132, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Mr. ROWE (for) with Mr. MCCLINTIC (against).

Mr. EDMONDS (for) with Mr. CRAMTON (against).

Mr. SCULLY (for) with Mr. SHOUSE (against).

Mr. COSTELLO (for) with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania (against).

Mr. VARE (for) with Mr. ROWLAND (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. GRIEST with Mr. KNUTSON.

Mr. BENSON with Mr. FOCHT.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH with Mr. BRITTEN.

Mr. HELM with Mr. IRELAND.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, on the vote just taken I am recorded in the affirmative. I forgot that I was paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. WALSH. I wish to withdraw that vote and to vote "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, on the motion to recommit I voted "no" inadvertently, forgetting that I was paired with the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. REAVIS. I desire to withdraw my vote, and I ask unanimous consent to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to withdraw his vote and to be recorded as present. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I wish to make the same request. I was paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. WALSH. I thought he was back here, and inadvertently voted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the same request. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I came into the room hurriedly from a committee meeting, misunderstood the motion to recommit, and voted "no." I should like to ask unanimous consent to change my vote from no to aye.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] asks unanimous consent to change his vote from no to aye on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am not very distinct in my memory. Does the Speaker remember when last a request of this kind was made and Members were allowed to change their votes in this way?

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is that it has been done once or twice, and it has been objected to sometimes. The Chair will give his opinion that it is a very poor practice.

Mr. MANN. The statement is already in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask that the vote on the bill be again reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is trying to change his vote on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the one I desire to know about.

The SPEAKER. Ninety-one ayes and 103 noes. That is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that the vote that the gentleman desires to change his vote upon?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to break any precedent. It is not very material, and I withdraw my request.

On motion of Mr. SMALL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is not here, and he asked me to announce that were he here he would vote against the motion to recommit and in favor of the passage of the bill.

BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 13440 transferring jurisdiction and control over Battle Mountain Sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers from the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the Secretary of War for use for Army hospital purposes for the period covered by the exigencies growing out of the present war.

Mr. BARNHART. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman make some statement.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13440) transferring jurisdiction and control over Battle Mountain Sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers from the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the Secretary of War for use for Army hospital purposes for the period covered by the exigencies growing out of the present war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. SLOAN. I object.

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman from Nebraska withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. SLOAN. I will, but I shall object if no one else does.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, this is a Government institution and the national board of control has signified in writing their consent for its transfer to the Surgeon General, who needs it for hospital purposes. It was built for a hospital, it is a hospital, and the Surgeon General's office needs it to take care of the returned wounded soldiers from over the seas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it to be open to discharged soldiers or only to those who are returned and retained in the service?

Mr. GANDY. To take care of wounded soldiers in the service. I may say that there are only 230 inmates there now, and there are 1,000 vacant beds in the home at Danville. It is proposed to take the members from this sanitarium to Danville for the time being.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SLOAN. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. EAGAN, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for three days on account of sickness.

INVESTIGATION OF LIGNITE.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3220, insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3220, insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. The Clerk will report the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat, to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products.

RELIEF IN EUROPE.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I submit the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 499 (H. Rept. No. 915).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 13708 (a bill providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary); that there shall be not exceeding three and one-quarter hours of general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, to be divided equally between those supporting and those opposing the bill, and to be controlled equally by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], at the end of which time the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule, and at the conclusion of such reading the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House, together with the amendments, if any, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate on the rule be 80 minutes, 40 minutes to be controlled by myself and 40 minutes by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. At the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent that the debate on this rule be confined to 80 minutes, half to be controlled by himself and half controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]; that at the end of 80 minutes the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman a question. The rule provides for three and a quarter hours of debate on the bill. On the rule would be 80 minutes additional, which would make in the neighborhood of five hours before it is completed. Then it would be considered under the five-minute rule. Is it the intention of the gentleman from Kentucky, if the gentleman from North Carolina knows, to ask the House to stay in session to-day until the bill is completed?

Mr. POU. I think that is the intention of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will say that that was my desire, and I presumed it would be the desire of the House. The days are passing, and if everyone knew the matter was to be disposed of to-day there would be an assurance of the full attendance which the importance of the matter demands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the gentleman, as there is some ambiguity in the phrase, whether it is the intention of the committee, or of the two gentlemen named, to control the time both in favor and against, or is one to control the time entirely in opposition and the other entirely in favor of the bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. It was my understanding that the gentleman from Massachusetts would control the time in opposition. I would control the time in favor of the bill, and it is my purpose to give to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] practically one-half of my time for such use as he may see fit to make of it on his side of the House for those who favor the proposal.

Mr. LITTLE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the chairman. I could not hear everything that was said, but do I understand that his request would prevent the offering of amendments?

Mr. POU. No.

Mr. MANN. It would prevent an amendment to the rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL].

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order a bill from the Committee on Appropriations which appropriates $100,000,000 to relieve famine conditions in Europe. There was no objection in the Committee on Rules to the form of the rule. The Committee on Rules is unanimous, I believe, in the opinion that the terms of the rule are entirely fair, and there was no criticism as to the rule itself. There was, however, in the Committee on Rules, determined opposition to the bill which the rule seeks to make in order, and I would like to have the House know that the Committee on Appropriations, one of the most conservative and careful committees of the House, after a full consideration, made a favorable report upon the bill appropriating $100,000,000; and the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], appeared before the Committee on Rules, in behalf of his committee, asking for the adoption of this rule.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANTRILL. I have very little time, but I will yield for a very brief question.

Mr. GORDON. Just a question to ask the gentleman what the vote was in the Committee on Appropriations, that great, conservative committee?

Mr. CANTRILL. All that I know is that it was a majority vote, which is sufficient to bring the matter before the House and before the Committee on Rules. If it had not been a majority vote, of course the chairman of that committee would not have come before the Committee on Rules.

The facts are these, as we understand them on the record that has been made before the Committee on Rules: There are thousands and tens of thousands of people in Europe who to-day are starving to death. It comes to us from the best of authority that within the next two or three months there will be millions of people in Europe starving, and the Governments of England and France and Italy have already appointed their commissions and put behind them financial support, and to-day are relieving as best they can famine conditions in Europe. This Government, through the President of the United States, has called upon Congress and the American people to cooperate with these European Governments in helping to relieve these famine conditions. I appeal to this House, and especially to the Republican side of the House, to repudiate the action of the gentlemen of the Committee on Rules representing that side of the House when they undertake to say to the peoples of the world that the United States are so stingy and so devoid of all principles of humanity and Christianity that they will not cooperate with other Governments in saving millions of starving women and children in this world. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANTRILL. No; I have not the time. I have only a few minutes, as the gentleman knows. That is the situation that is before us; and the eyes of the world and the eyes of the people of this Nation are looking at this House to-day to see whether or not we are willing, out of our abundance and plenty, the American people and this Government, the richest in all the world, after having appropriated money by the billions for war munitions with which to kill people, whether now we are willing to place ourselves in the attitude of refusing to appropriate a paltry $100,000,000 in order to cooperate with the great civilized nations of France, Italy, and England to save millions of women and children from starving to death. The great God of the universe has blessed this country more than any other in the history of the world, and do you gentlemen mean to tell me that upon a great occasion like this you intend to draw political and party lines upon the question of millions of people starving to death?

Yet this House to-day is confronted with the spectacle of gentlemen on the Committee on Rules representing the Republican side of the House voting against supporting the rule when the Committee on Appropriations had already passed favorably upon it. Gentlemen on the Republican side of the House, I ask you to repudiate that action. If you are not in favor of the bill, I do beg you, in the name of humanity, with millions of people starving to death, to at least adopt the rule and bring the bill before the House, where it may be considered upon its merits, so that the American people may know the real condition that exists in Europe to-day. [Applause.] One of the most distinguished American women has recently come back, after giving her services to the Red Cross, and she delivered a lecture in this city the other day. Speaking from actual observation she said that in many places in Europe to-day mothers having three or four or five children are now compelled to pick the child that they will permit to die, because they can not get food enough to feed them all. Yet do you gentlemen on the Republican side of the House mean to tell me that in such conditions as that you propose to have the party lash applied to you and refuse to adopt this rule, so that you may have the opportunity of hearing the bill upon its merits? The facts are as we get them from the very best of authority, that the appropriation of this paltry sum will relieve conditions—and it is a paltry sum compared with the billions that we have appropriated without a dissenting voice in recent days. It is a fact that this appropriation will do more to satisfy European countries that this Nation is sincere in its demand for peace than anything else we can do. When people are starving you can not ask them to give favorable consideration to any peace terms or to any terms that would help reestablish law and order. The first thoughts of people who are starving turn to anarchy, and in large measure, in my opinion, the great turmoil that is existing in Europe to-day is due more to famine than to any other one condition, and yet when we are asked to cooperate, not to assume the entire burden ourselves, with these other great Governments, whose commissions have already been appointed, and I believe Lord Reading has been appointed as the head of the English commission—when we are asked to appropriate this money we find bitter opposition, and I say all honor and glory to the Committee on Appropriations of this House for favorably voting upon it, including the distinguished gentleman frm Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the father of the House, in whom every Member has implicit confidence. There was no politics in it, as I understand it, in the Committee on Appropriations, because the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is heartily in favor of the bill, and I am asking you to adopt the rule in order that you gentlemen upon the Republican side of the House may hear him speak upon the merits of the proposition, and I am sure that you gentlemen have unlimited confidence in his judgment, especially on matters of this character. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the resolution that is presented by the chairman of the Committee on Rules, if adopted by this House to-day, makes in order the boldest piece of legislation that has been introduced in the Sixty-fifth Congress. This legislation contemplated by this bill will open up a brand new field of limitless public expenditure, and it is of such a character that it demands the most careful and considerate attention by every Member of the House. During the last two or three years we have become accustomed to pass appropriations of $1,000,000, $2,000,000, $100,000,000—yes, five and ten billions of dollars—at one time, with hardly any debate, with scarcely the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

But, mind you, gentlemen, we did that because the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army, said that it was absolutely necessary for the prosecution of the war. When we received those commands, Republicans and Democrats alike stood shoulder to shoulder, rose to the situation, and almost unanimously voted President Wilson more money and more power than that which has been granted to any king or potentate in the history of the civilized world. But we did that to win the war. Now, thank God, the war is over and an entirely different situation confronts us. Let me tell you, gentlemen of the House, the day has gone by when you can hold a man up to public ridicule, call him un-American, unpatriotic, and pro-German because he demands full information [applause on the Republican side] before he votes to give away the people's money. That is the reason I am opposed to this rule and this bill here to-day. The information is not available to this House why we should grant Mr. Wilson and Mr. Hoover this new, additional, and unlimited authority. Mr. Speaker, because we granted President Wilson's every request to win the war, that is no sign we will follow him blindfolded in reconstructing the Old World. The financial conditions of this country at the present are such that the American people demand that this Congress shall closely scrutinize every dollar of public expenditure. They demand that we shall not appropriate a dollar of public money that is not absolutely needed, and every man in this House knows that the business of this country will fairly groan under the taxes that will be levied by the present pending revenue bill; and the worst of it all is the end is not yet in sight. I was told by a member of the Committee on Ways and Means this morning that there would be a deficit in the public funds this year of $10,000,000,000. A $5,000,000,000 loan will come this spring and another later in the season.

Now, with these financial conditions confronting us, I maintain that there are no $100,000,000 plums for any one man's basket, unless we have the most positive and definite information as to the absolute necessity, the how, where, and why it will be spent, and that information is not available at the present time. Mr. Speaker, if I can read the signs of the times, there is more unrest, uncertainty, and, I think I may say, discontent, among the laboring population, the manufacturer, the farmer, and business men to-day than at any time in recent years. High taxation and higher cost of living are causing the spread of Bolshevikism in our own country, and, notwithstanding this, the President demands that we place a $100,000,000 additional tax on our people, that, as he says, Mr. Hoover may stop the spread of Bolshevikism and anarchy in a foreign land. The time has come, gentlemen, when the President of the United States and the Members of this Congress should give more attention to the reconstruction problems here at home and less to the political intrigues of map-making of southern Europe. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am not opposed to rendering relief to the stricken and starving populations of the Old World. I will go just as far as any man in private or public expenditure along this line, but I do maintain that the time has come, if we are going to open up a new field for public expenditures of this kind, that President Wilson should tell the Congress and the American people what he intends to do and how far he is going along this line. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Just a minute more.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. And I also maintain that the time has come when, to a certain extent at least, he should take us into his confidence in regard to his reconstruction and peace plans, and until he does that and until he does furnish us the information to which we are entitled I maintain it is the duty of every man in this House to vote against these questionable lump-sum appropriations. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield back any time he did not use?

Mr. SNELL. I yield back whatever time may be remaining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back half a minute.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman use some more of his time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would like the gentleman from North Carolina to use some more of his time.

Mr. POU. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am for this bill. [Applause.] Let us stop a minute and see what is involved. There is no time in the short debate to show what the merits of this proposition are. This proposition is to consider this bill, and I want to ask this side of the House and that side of the House, Are you afraid to consider this bill upon its merits? [Applause.] The only way to get intelligent consideration is to consider it.

So much for that. Oh, I have here a letter written by President Roosevelt, a message, just as the ships went around the world, in regard to the great earthquake in Italy and the $800,000 which he asked of the Congress, and it was given without a word, and when it was given he expended it for food. The returning eight battleships and other ships were sent to help relieve the condition. They were fed. It was in time of peace. He was a great statesman, and he was broad enough to understand that in this country is the great melting pot, and it was put upon that ground as well as to relieve misfortune. And after he fed them he built houses over there from that appropriation, and it met with the approval of this country. A score or more of similar appropriations have been made. Now, what is the condition, just briefly, and all I can do is to refer to it? Outside of the allies the Bolsheviki are in possession everywhere in Europe except Germany, and making great headway there. Oh, perhaps, not in Finland.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. SLOAN. Did ex-President Roosevelt ask to have personal charge of that $800,000 appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; it was expended under his direction.

Mr. SLOAN. That he should have personal charge of it?

Mr. CANNON. Well, he did have personal charge of it. How else could you expend it? [Applause.] I simply refer to it in passing. Great God, I think I have got in my make-up a strain of German, a strain of English, a strain of Irish, and a strain of French. [Laughter and applause.] God made the world, and under God we have had the progress we have had. Now, at the end of this great contest what have you? A peace table. Who is at the table? Germany? No. Germany is fighting as to whether she will go absolutely to the Bolsheviki, which means anarchy there. Austria? No. Russia? No. The Balkans? No; unless it be Serbia that will get in. There you are. What security have you as to who you are to negotiate with for peace? Now, it is put upon this ground as a matter of policy. First, it is good policy that people should not starve, for if they are starving they will take food with a strong hand. Why, God knows there is not a man within the sound of my voice, if there was anarchy in the United States as they have it in Europe outside of the allies, and food was short—there is not a man in this House of Representatives, if his family was starving and he was starving, but would take it with a strong hand if it could be found. If there is one such, let him rise up now. [Applause.]

No man rises on either side of the House.

This is to relieve a condition; and yet gentlemen say that they will not even consider this proposition. I do not indorse lots of things that Woodrow Wilson has done; but he is our President. Right or wrong, he is over there trying to do things.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Our expenditures during this war were $40,000,000 per day. This $100,000,000 would amount to the expenditures for two days and a half, where we have expended very well up toward $30,000,000,000, and, God knows, when the end comes and we have peace, after all things are determined, war risks and everything else, it may amount to $50,000,000,000 or $60,000,000,000.

We have the food; we can demonstrate that. We have the wheat that the Government owns. We have an excess of pork and fats and cottonseed oil and lard oil. This money will be expended in this country, substantially. From the standpoint of a wise policy, without any indorsement of Woodrow Wilson, except as it is necessary to recognize that he is our President and will be for two years to come—the only President we have—we ought not to withhold proper aid to work out these problems. In the event this rule is adopted I will speak a little more at length and give reasons why, in my judgment, this bill should pass. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Illinois use his entire time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He used all of his time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], a member of the Committee on Appropriations. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I opposed this bill in the committee and I oppose it now. However, I did say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that I would do what I could to have the bill brought before the House, and what I have to say, therefore, is not in opposition to the rule, because I realized that the merits of this proposition could not be discussed in 80 minutes, but will in part explain my opposition to the bill itself.

But a few weeks remain of this Sixty-fifth Congress. This Congress will go down in history as the greatest legislative assembly in all the world. It passed more important legislation, appropriated more money, did more real substantial work than any other legislative body in the world. And it all was done with a singleness of purpose and a patriotism that touched every Member of the House. We were in favor of winning the war, and we voted without party division to give the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, all the power and all the money necessary to win imperishable glory for our country and our country's flag. But, Mr. Speaker, when on the 11th day of last November the President appeared in our presence and read that most remarkable message, giving in detail the terms of the armistice, he concluded by saying:

> The war thus comes to an end; for, having accepted these terms of armistice, it will be impossible for the German command to renew it.

I approach, therefore, the discussion of this subject on the solemn declaration of the President that two months ago the war came to an end and that Germany would be unable to renew it. When the war was on we gave him all the money he asked for its prosecution; we gave him all the power, all the legislation which he demanded to win the war. Now that the war is over, I believe that Congress, one of the coordinate branches of the Government, should again commence to function; that it should pass upon all demands; and that the House of Representatives, which is entrusted under the Constitution with originating all appropriation bills, shall before it passes appropriation bills know the details not only with regard to the needs for which the appropriations are asked but the conditions under which the appropriations are to be expended. Now that the war is over, I am not willing to pass lump-sum appropriation bills to carry out objects, no matter how worthy, unless we understand all the facts. Of course, there is starvation in Europe; there always has been, there always will be, and I am willing to go as far as any man to give relief to the needy and the suffering. If we would rise to our full duty in such an emergency we would not pass a lump-sum appropriation, much of which might be wasted in its administration. But if the emergency is urgent we would give to the American Red Cross, that great mother of humanity, composed as it is of more than 22,000,000 Americans, who are contributing to its objects—we would delegate to that organization, with more than 5,000 relief commissioners in Europe, the task of bringing relief; we would give them more than our full share of the funds necessary to prevent suffering and starvation. I am not in favor of this bill, which, if enacted into law, will, I fear, be the first step which we will have taken since war came to an end to invite extravagance and waste in the expenditure of public funds.

I do not object to appropriating this money because it is granted to the President. I am opposed to appropriating any lump sum, giving any individual, no matter who he is, full power and discretion over its expenditure. By the very nature of things, the President, because of his multitudinous duties, can not investigate the expenditure of such vast sums that have been entrusted to his care. He has been compelled to turn these matters over to subordinates and bureau chiefs. When the history of this war is written men will be shocked to learn how hundreds of millions of dollars were utterly wasted, and most of the waste came through lump-sum appropriations. Now that the war is over, we should profit by our experiences during the war and appropriate money only when we know all the facts for which the appropriation is sought, and we should make detailed appropriation in a manner so that the fund can not be spent for any other object than that for which it was expressly appropriated.

I think I can define my position best by relating here what has already been done in what I believe to be an illegal appropriation by the President of $5,000,000 out of the funds granted to the President for national security and defense.

I have here a statement from the War Trade Board for publication on December 15, 1918, which reads:

> The loading of two additional vessels with cargoes for Russia and arrangements for continued shipments through January and February through the activity of the War Trade Board of the United States Russian Bureau (Inc.) was announced to-day by the War Trade Board. The dispatch of three vessels to Vladivostok carrying materials urgently needed in Siberia previously was announced.
> Private capital, acting on information furnished through the Russian bureau, is financing most of these cargoes, which include also materials for Czecho-Slovak relief and railroad materials. This is in harmony with the announced policy of the board to encourage and promote the rehabilitation of Russia's economic life and to cover by direct operations only those portions of the field which can not be served readily by private enterprise. Plans for shipments to Vladivostok, Black Sea, and the Baltic were considered by the board at its meeting to-day.

When my attention was called to this work of the War Trade Board of the United States Russian Bureau (Inc.), I commenced a search to ascertain if Congress had authorized its incorporation. I found no such record. I found that Vance McCormick and a majority of the members of the War Trade Board had incorporated under the title "The War Trade Board of United States Russian Bureau (Inc.)," and that Vance McCormick was president, and John Foster Dulles, nephew of Secretary Lansing, was the secretary and treasurer. This concern was incorporated under the laws of the State of Connecticut. The certificate of incorporation provides "that the amount of capital stock with which this corporation shall commence business is $5,000,000." The incorporators, with their holdings of stock, are as follows: Vance McCormick, 1 share; J. Beaver White, 1 share; Edwin F. Gay, 1 share; Clarence M. Woolley, 1 share; Albert Strauss, 1 share; Alonzo E. Taylor, 1 share; Thomas L. Chadbourne, jr., 1 share; H. Starr Giddings, 1 share; Stoddard M. Stevens, jr., 1 share; Ralph Royall, 1 share; and Vance C. McCormick, chairman of the War Trade Board, 49,990 shares. It is thus seen that these incorporators include a majority of the directors of the War Trade Board, and that each incorporator subscribed for only 1 share of stock, but that the remaining 49,990 shares are held by Mr. Vance C. McCormick as chairman of the War Trade Board. The $5,000,000, I am advised by the War Trade Board, was contributed by the President out of the $100,000,000 which Congress appropriated to him in a lump sum for national security and defense. It is therefore apparent that this incorporation to which I have referred is a United States corporation. The United States really owns all of the stock, and on inquiry I find that it is through this corporation that the United States proposes to deal with the Russian situation.

I am advised that it will take many millions more to carry out the intentions of the department, and I undertake to say that if anything at all is done along the line provided for in the charter of this corporation the amount involved will reach billions of dollars.

While we were willing to vote and did vote without party division billions of dollars to prosecute the war, and I believe now are willing to vote millions of dollars to relieve distress, suffering, and starvation in Europe, yet I want to say that I do not believe there is a man here who down in his heart would be willing to vote one dollar out of the Treasury to carry out the provisions found in this certificate of incorporation, wherein are enumerated all the objects of the corporation.

Would you be willing to give to the President $5,000,000 to organize a company to engage in the manufacture of all kinds of products in any and all parts of the world, to prospect for minerals and metals and mine them, or to buy agricultural, grazing, and timber lands in all parts of the world, or to buy precious stones, or to buy, build, own, and manage hotels, boarding houses, and restaurants in all parts of the world outside of the State of Connecticut, or to buy and operate railroads in all parts of the world outside of the State of Connecticut, or to loan money in all parts of the world outside of the State of Connecticut, or to carry on the business of banking in all parts of the world outside of the State of Connecticut? No; of course, you would not; and yet, out of the $100,000,000 that was given to the President by Congress to carry on the war, he has given $5,000,000 to this corporation which is empowered to do all these things, and many other things.

I have read the wonderful dream of Cecil Rhodes. I have read with interest and enthusiasm the charter of the Hudson Bay Co., but I undertake to say here and now that the dream of Cecil Rhodes or the charter of the Hudson Bay Co. is not to be compared with this wonderful document setting forth the aims and purposes of the War Trade Board of United States Russian Bureau (Inc.).

I will append to my remarks the certificate of organization, but the certificate of incorporation is so illuminating that I shall read it for your information, in order that you may see the objects to which the President has set aside $5,000,000 appropriated to him in a lump sum for national security and defense.

It is as follows:

Certificate of Incorporation of the War Trade Board of United States Russian Bureau (Inc.).

We, the subscribers, certify that we do hereby associate ourselves as a body politic and corporate under the statute laws of the State of Connecticut, and we further certify—

First. That the name of the corporation is the War Trade Board of United States Russian Bureau (Inc.).

Second. That the said corporation is to be located in the town of Hartford, County of Hartford, State of Connecticut.

Third. That the nature of the business to be transacted and the purposes to be promoted or carried out by said corporation are as follows:

2. To engage in any and all kinds of manufacturing, and to acquire, hold, lease, and sell all lands, buildings, machinery, and equipment, and all raw materials and supplies necessary to or useful in the conduct of any such business in any part of the world.

3. To search for, prospect, explore, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, own, develop, work, operate, sell, lease, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of any and all agricultural, grazing, timber, or other lands, mineral deposits, mines, mining properties, collieries, and quarries, and the products and by-products thereof, all in any part of the world.

4. To cultivate, cut, mine, crush, smelt, concentrate, refine, treat, prepare for market, buy, sell, exchange, export, import, trade and deal in any and all agricultural products, timber, and timber products, oil, petroleum, coal, iron, metals, phosphates, nitrates, minerals, precious stones, and materials and products and by-products of all kinds, all in any part of the world.

All of this under the guise of feeding the starving people of Russia. Further:

5. To build, construct, complete, equip, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, hold, own, manage, operate, maintain, mortgage, sell, or otherwise, dispose of hotels, apartment houses, boarding and lodging houses, restaurants, stores, shops, and places of public entertainment or amusement, all in any part of the world, outside of the State of Connecticut.

[Laughter.]

What is the matter with Connecticut?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. No; I regret I can not. I have not the time—

6. To build, construct, complete, equip, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, hold, own, manage, operate, maintain, mortgage, sell or otherwise dispose of railways, telephone and telegraph systems, gas and electric light and power works, plants and systems, and any other plants, machinery or works for the production, manufacture, transmission and distribution of light or energy of every nature and description, and to furnish and sell gas, electricity, steam and any other kind of substance or energy used for lighting, heating, or power purposes, all in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut.

[Laughter.]

7. To build, construct, complete, equip, purchase, lease or otherwise acquire, hold, own, maintain, operate, mortgage, sell, or otherwise dispose of, or turn to account, reservoirs, water powers, dams, flumes, watercourses, aqueducts, water rights, canals, irrigation systems, sewage, drainage and sanitary works, water works and to furnish and sell water and water power, all in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut.

8. To promote, finance, build, construct, complete, equip, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, hold, own, operate, maintain, mortgage, sell, or otherwise dispose of wharves, piers, docks, bulkheads, drydocks, basins, tugs, floats, lighters, storehouses, warehouses, elevators, oil tanks, and other terminal facilities of all kinds, all in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut.

9. To build, equip, buy, own, lease, operate, and sell steamships, sailing vessels and any and all other kinds of craft or instrumentalities used or to be used in the business of transporting freight or passengers upon water; and in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut to operate the same, and engage in the transportation of or in the business of transporting freight or passengers.

10. To take and receive upon deposit, as bailee, for safekeeping and storage, jewelry, plate, money, specie, bullion, stocks, bonds, securities, and valuable papers of any kind, and other valuable personal property, and to guarantee their safety, upon such terms and for such compensation as may be agreed upon by it and the respective bailors thereof, and to let out vaults, safes, and other receptacles, all in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut.

11. To make loans or advances, either ordinary or privileged, either with or without security, at such rates of interest as may be agreed upon between the corporation and the borrower, either for ordinary banking or commercial purposes or for the special purpose of facilitating mining, agricultural, and industrial operations and public utilities, all in any part of the world outside of the State of Connecticut.

Now, get this, my Democratic friends, and never again refer to trusts or illegal combinations:

16. To enter into any agreement or arrangement for sharing profits, union of interest, reciprocal concessions or cooperations, with any country, firm, or person carrying on or proposing to carry on any business within or similar to any of the objects of this company; to guarantee the contracts and obligations of any such company, firm, or person; to unite with any such company, firm, or person in the creation of joint or joint and several obligations of any and every character which this company may find it necessary or convenient to create, or issue in the execution of any business or the carrying out of any purpose specified in this certificate; but none of the business authorized by this paragraph shall be done within the State of Connecticut.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Vance McCormick has provided here for the greatest trust the world ever saw and it is financed out of the $100,000,000 given to the President for national security and defense, and all of it is done under the cover of feeding the starving people of Russia.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. No; I can not yield.

17. To acquire in any manner, hold, and own bonds, debentures, or other obligations, or evidences of indebtedness or securities, or shares of capital stock in any corporation or corporations, association or associations, and while owner thereof to exercise the rights, powers, and privileges of ownership, including the right to vote on any shares of stock or in respect of any bonds or debentures so held or owned.

18. To carry on the business of banking in all its branches, and to transact and do all matters and things incidental thereto, or which may be usual in connection with the business of banking or dealing in money or securities for money, including, among other things, the issue of due bills, circulating notes to bearer, bank notes, promissory notes, or the discounting and negotiating, buying, selling, paying, or collecting of promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of indebtedness; receiving deposits, buying and selling exchange, bank notes, bullion, and coin, and loaning money on real and personal security, but no part of the business specified in this paragraph shall be done in the State of Connecticut.

Think of it! The President giving Mr. Vance McCormick's private corporation, even though the stock is held by the War Trade Board, $5,000,000 to carry on banking in any part of the world, with power to issue due bills, circulating notes to bearer, bank notes, etc., all to prevent the people of Russia from starving.

19. The corporation shall have power to do any and all things set forth as its objects to the same extent and as fully as a natural person might or could do, as principal, agent, contractor, or otherwise, and by or through trustees, agents, subcontractors, or otherwise, alone or jointly with any other corporation, association, firm, or person, and to execute all acts and enter into all contracts, civil and mercantile, and to do all and everything necessary or incidental for the protection or benefit of the corporation: Provided, however, That this corporation shall not have power to transact, within the State of Connecticut, the business of a bank, savings bank, trust company, building and loan association, insurance company, surety or indemnity company, railroad or street railway company, telegraph or telephone company, gas, electric-light or water company, or the business of a company requiring the right to take and condemn lands within the said State, or to occupy the public highways within said State; and nothing herein contained shall be construed to permit the doing of any acts within the said State not authorized in the case of a corporation organized under the general laws thereof, nor permit the doing of any acts in any other State or Territory of the United States, or in any foreign country, if prohibited by the laws of such State, Territory, or foreign country: And provided further, That within the State of Connecticut this corporation shall not have the power to and shall not sell or negotiate its own choses in action, nor sell, guarantee, nor negotiate the choses in action of any other person or corporations as investments.

Fourth. That the amount of the capital stock of said corporation hereby authorized is $5,000,000, divided into 50,000 shares of the par value of $100 each, all of one class.

Fifth. That the amount of capital stock with which this corporation shall commence business is $5,000,000.

Sixth. That the duration of said corporation is unlimited.

Then follows the signatures of the incorporators.

These are the things that the War Trade Board of the United States Russian Bureau (Inc.) wants to do, and for the accomplishment of these things the President has turned over to this board $5,000,000; and not a man sitting on the floor of the House would vote money out of the Treasury of the United States for these express purposes. This incorporation needs more money to carry them out, and if we vote this $100,000,000 the President has the same power to turn over any or all of it to this same corporation that he had to give it $5,000,000.

Yes; we are asked now to appropriate $100,000,000, just as we were asked during the war to appropriate, and did appropriate, a lump sum of $100,000,000 for national security and defense. And if we vote this money, in the future we must not complain if any part of it is engaged in merchandising in all parts of the world, or in manufacturing in all parts of the world, or in mining and developing mines in all parts of the world, or in buying and owning and operating railroads, electric-light and gas plants, and banking, and everything under the sun, in all parts of the world.

To some of you the granting of this tremendous power may seem comical, but to my mind it is a most dangerous thing. I am willing that America shall do her part to feed the starving people of Europe, but I am not willing that we shall engage in all of these enterprises under the guise of preventing starvation.

I must confess that in one sense the situation is comical. Why, we are going to establish hotels in all parts of the world. Of course, that is one of the best ways to feed the people who are hungry. My attention was called a few days ago to the New York Hotel Review, a paper published by the New York hotels to exploit the wonderful things they have accomplished. I find a news item in this paper to the effect that John McE. Bowman, president of the Commodore, Biltmore, Manhattan, and other hotels, was commissioned to select a chef for the President's party during his trip abroad, and Mr. Sweeney was commissioned to select a culinary force. Mr. Bowman selected the chef of the Biltmore, Mr. Lewis Seres, and the article concludes:

Mr. Sweeney, however, in a comparatively short time interviewed, selected, and caused to be sworn into the United States Navy, a culinary crew of 25, which is the largest culinary crew ever gotten together for a transocean voyage. It might be said here that Mr. Sweeney was the man who selected the culinary force for the train that carried Prince Henry of Prussia to Canada on the occasion of his visit here several years ago. Four of the members of the culinary crew of the George Washington were sworn in as petty officers.

And I suppose that when Mr. Vance McCormick has acquired these hotels and restaurants and boarding houses in all parts of the world, that it is proposed to acquire under the terms of this charter, we will have as cooks in all of these hotels petty officers from the Navy, and possibly all of these will be selected by the same person who selected "the culinary force for the train which carried Prince Henry of Prussia to Canada on the occasion of his visit here several years ago."

Again, we are told that millions of people are starving in Europe. I suppose there is great suffering in many parts of Europe. I wish we might prevent the starving of a single person. I wish we might do something in a big and substantial way to alleviate the suffering and prevent starving. But I have wondered whether or not this matter has not been a little overdrawn, for almost coincident with the cablegram of the President, I read an article in the New York Times, on December 28, under the following headlines:

Georgeous scene at banquet—All royal formalities observed at King's dinner to Wilson—Largest display of plate—Gold service worth $15,000,000 are brought from the palace vaults for occasion.

Can it be possible that almost within the shadow of the building where that banquet was given men and women were starving? Is it possible that that great Democrat could sit down to a table spread with a $15,000,000 gold plate and then send a message to America within a day or two, telling us that millions were starving in Europe, and that we should give him $100,000,000 to prevent it? [Applause.]

Now, what have we done in a practical way to relieve this distress? First, we have given to the Secretary of the Treasury power to loan money to all these countries of Europe that are mentioned in the hearings, and he has even loaned money to the Czecho-Slovaks, a great people, but whose organization as yet is practically only on paper; yet we are loaning money to them out of the Treasury, to feed their people. We are loaning money to Serbia and to the Balkan States. We have loaned vast sums to our other allies, including Russia, and the newspapers yesterday carried the statement from Mr. Glass that Government loans to foreign countries are restricted now to necessary credits for the purchase of foodstuffs in this country. It is apparent that not a single country mentioned in the hearings, which is in need of foodstuffs, is having any difficulty in borrowing the money from Uncle Sam to buy these necessities.

Now, in addition to that, in order to duplicate the service, it is proposed to give the President $100,000,000 in order to feed these same people.

Mr. Speaker, a book has recently been written by Dr. E. A. Ross, of the University of Wisconsin, entitled "Russia in Upheaval." The author has been there and has just recently returned. I quote from page 13 of that book:

By the railroad, not far from Irkutsk, are piled up four millions of pounds of Siberian meat, spoiling in the July sun because there is no railway stock for moving it to Russia.

And again on page 334 I read:

From all sides we are receiving news of disorders and excesses at railway stations by soldiers and others. The railways are in the power of the mob. Cars are opened, and their contents plundered. Large numbers of profiteers are transporting goods arbitrarily without having paid anything on them. Cars are uncoupled from trains, thus interfering with the instructions of the railway servants. This state of anarchy has entirely disorganized the transport service.

Think of it! At Irkutsk, the author saw piled up 4,000,000 pounds of Siberian meat, spoiling in the July sun, because there was no railway stock to move it. It would require 8,000 average carcasses to make 4,000,000 pounds of meat; and the second statement of this author clearly shows why these foodstuffs can not be delivered to the people. Send American meat there, and is it not likely to be seized by the lawless and will it not only make them stronger in their fight against organized society? Much as we desire, we can not prevent starvation in Russia.

I desire also to call attention to the fact that already Mr. Hoover, through his grain corporation, has enough money to buy all the surplus wheat in the United States, and after he has bought it at $2.20 per bushel, he will still have in his fund, according to the hearings, almost $50,000,000 to buy other cereals. And remember, it is not urged that any corn be purchased for export to Europe for this purpose.

I call your attention to page 19 of the hearings, wherein it is shown that we raised in the United States last year 917,000,000 bushels of wheat. It is estimated by Mr. Hoover that it will take 600,000,000 bushels or thereabouts to feed our own population and to furnish seed for the next year, leaving 317,000,000 bushels available for export. Mr. Hoover's assistant states that 200,000,000 bushels have already been sold and exported to Europe, leaving only 117,000,000 bushels available for export. If every bushel of that was bought by Mr. Hoover at $2.20 per bushel, it would require about $257,000, and according to the statement of Mr. Glasgow, Mr. Hoover has for this purpose $300,000,000. Hence, he would have $50,000,000 left to buy other grains to feed the starving people of Europe after he had bought every bushel of American wheat available for export.

Now, if you will turn to page 4 of the hearings I think you will find the real secret of Mr. Hoover's desire. I quote:

Because of the stimulation of the production of hogs throughout the hog-producing sections of the country we have accumulated in the hands of packers, by reason of the run on hogs at this particular time of the year, a large surplus that we must work off as we can to Europe, and one of the purposes of Mr. Hoover has been, if possible, to provide a safe and regular drain of such edibles as fats, oils, and cereals that we have a surplus of to Europe.

You will observe that we are told that there is a surplus of fats and oils in the hands of the packers, by reason of the run of hogs at this particular time of the year, a large surplus that Mr. Hoover says must be worked off, quoting his words, in "a safe and regular drain." Ah, there must be no slump in the price of these fats in the hands of the packers; a safe and regular drain of this surplus of fats that are in the hands of the packers of the country must be sent to Europe, so that there can be no slump in the price, while this surplus is in their hands. [Applause.]

That is the crux of this whole matter, and you can not get away from it, and I want to say now that if this scheme of stabilizing the market is put through under the guise of saving the starving in Europe, hundreds, yes thousands, of our fellow Americans will, because of high prices that will be maintained, be made to suffer, and many of them will starve.

I am unwilling for one to permit the packer or any other producer in the United States to reach his hand down into the Treasury of the United States in order to stabilize and hold up the price of their product.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. No; I am sorry I do not have the time.

I find here in the Christian Science Monitor a statement with regard to the $6,000,000 of profits made by the Cudahy Packing Co., from which I quote:

After paying the regular dividends on the preferred stock, the $6,000,000 profit would represent an earning power of 47.4 per cent on the common stock.

It was inevitable that the packers would make money during the war. They were selling their product on a rising market. Vast sums were made by them because of that fact. They realized that the time was coming when they would be compelled to sell their product on a falling market, when they would lose some of these immense profits made during the war, and I doubt not they thought they would be able to so conduct their affairs that in balancing their books over a period of years it would be found that they had made considerably more money when they were doing business on a rising market than they had lost when they were selling their goods on a falling market.

Now, Mr. Hoover comes forward with his program, and that is to stabilize the market so long as there is a surplus of fats in the hands of the packers. I do not believe there is any justification for his program, and hence I must oppose it. I have opposed stabilizing the markets of the produce in the hands of the farmers, and I must oppose stabilizing the profits in the hands of the combination that has fared very well and can well afford now to meet the very obstacle that every business man must meet.

I want to see America do America's part in this emergency, but I am not willing to duplicate the service which 22,000,000 of Americans are already performing through the American Red Cross. It has been said here to-day that the allies are furnishing food to the starving, while America is talking about it. I deny it. America is doing her full share, through the American Red Cross, to-day. She is not only helping the poor in the Balkans and in Russia, but she is contributing to the wants of the poor and the needy in France and in Italy, and even Great Britain. The last report of the American Red Cross shows that there is appropriated for relief work in Belgium over $2,000,000; for relief work in Italy, $3,588,000; for relief work in Russia, $1,243,000; and for relief work in Serbia, $875,180; for relief work in Great Britain, $1,885,000, and for relief in other foreign countries almost $4,000,000. And yet, in order to put this bill through, without investigation and without a knowledge of the real facts, we are told that America is not doing her part. This bill ought to be sent back to the committee, with instructions to that committee to call before it the officers of the American Red Cross here in Washington, and to hear those officers, and then, after a full and comprehensive survey, which can be had within the next few days, report out a bill that will be the measure of America's obligation in this emergency.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

By ELMER H. LOUNSBURY.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the speech the gentleman has just made is the most demagogic utterance I have ever heard on the floor of this House. He talks about a corporation that was organized for the purpose of carrying supplies and food to the starving people of Russia, and in no instance did he point out any abuse of the powers granted that corporation. I am not concerned about how the judgment and actions of this House to-day will affect Woodrow Wilson personally, but I am wondering how it will affect other people—not those for whom this relief is sought, for you know and I know if they are not relieved promptly their suffering, hunger, and distress will soon end in death. I am wondering how the action of the American Congress—how each vote and every utterance—will affect those people whose representatives are now sitting around the council table and who will be influenced in a greater or less degree by the representatives of the American Government.

The part this Government has played during this great world crisis is immeasurable. The influence it has wielded in bringing hostilities to a close has been incalculable. By his diplomacy President Wilson hastened the end, and the principles he enunciated have been accepted as the basic principles upon which peace will be made. It is due to his master genius that we have thus far approached peace. He is to-day recognized as the exponent of democracy, the apostle of justice, and the friend of liberty-loving peoples throughout the world. The estimate that the great masses of people in other countries place upon him will certainly be influenced to some extent by the confidence that his own people express in him.

The gentleman from Iowa talks about Bolshevism. Let me say to the gentleman that the spirit of Bolshevism, the most dangerous menace that has ever confronted free government, now rampant in the war-torn countries of central Europe, finds encouragement in disorder and threatens organized government by creating dissension among the people. If ever there was a time when the representatives of organized government needed to present a united front, it is to-day. Discord and dissensions give encouragement to Bolshevism.

President Wilson knows the situation with which we are called upon in this way to deal. He is on the ground and has studied the situation from every angle. No man in the world to-day has the confidence of the great masses of other countries to the extent that the President of this country does, and those people are looking to him with hope and an abiding faith. Ah, the gentleman cynically refers to the dinner with the royalty of England. It was not only the royalty who received him, but low as well as high, the poor as well as the rich, the humble as well as the royal of foreign lands. In Manchester, the great industrial center of Britain, he was greeted with unsurpassed enthusiasm and every expression of commendation was showered upon him. At Brest and Paris and all along the routes he has traveled in France flowers have strewn his path and he has been received with wild acclaim. The people of Milan and the country for miles around crowded the streets of that city to do him honor and give demonstration of their appreciation of his great efforts in the interest of lasting peace.

The President has sought this relief for suffering humanity, and if we fail to grant it we are not only opposing humanity but will be embarrassing the representatives of this Government in the peace negotiations. So let me urge you, gentlemen, to stand by your Government at this time; stand by it until the peace treaty is written and ratified by the Senate.

The American people have always been charitable, and they have manifested that spirit to greater extent during this great world crisis. They have contributed millions of dollars, not through the Government particularly but through other agencies, for the relief of the suffering people—Belgium, Serbia, and France—and to-day a great campaign is on to raise a large fund for the relief of stricken Armenia.

You can not afford to hold back on technicalities in this instance; you can not excuse your opposition to this measure by calling for details. Your views and actions in this instance will be construed as in the interest of suffering humanity or against humanity; as upholding the spokesman of your Government or opposing him.

I am not unmindful of the fact that some of you on that side of the House are intoxicated on success as the result of the recent elections, and in your political debauchery you have gone wild; but be not deceived. That little woman who lives in an humble cottage out yonder on the western plains, that patriotic farmer in the remote and out-of-way sections of the southland, as well as the toiler in the busy city who gave their sons to fight for the peace that our representatives are contending for will want to know the reason why you attempted at this time to embarrass your Government. And every boy who is now encamped on the western front awaiting the signing of the treaty of peace will want to know the reason for this opposition and obstruction.

Be not deceived, gentlemen, this war is not over yet; the treaty of peace has not been signed, and we must strengthen the hold that our representatives have in order to obtain the things for which our boys have fought, and your obstruction here to-day will either strengthen or hamstring their arms.

Let me suggest to you who are opposing this measure the story of the ass who was so unmanageable and untractable that no pasture no matter how green could restrain his roving disposition; no fence was strong enough to withhold him. So his master placed a yoke and bell around his neck. One day the ambitious ass broke through the fence and wandered over roads and fields to a near-by city and there paraded up and down the street, his yoke swinging from side to side and his bell ringing. He attracted the attention of passers-by and was very proud of his accomplishments. Presently his master came along and caught him, saying to the ass: "You are deceiving yourself. If you think your actions are attractive and pleasing to the crowds you are mistaken. That yoke you wear is not an emblem of praise, but a badge of dishonor."

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DENISON. The President came before us and said that it was necessary to vote for woman suffrage, in order to win the war. Does the gentleman stand by the President in that? [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Oh, the gentleman can not lead me astray on that proposition. He knows it is afield of this discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DEWALT). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman knows that I differed with the President on that proposition. But the gentleman knows, too, that when I cast my vote in the House, the President had not come before the Senate and laid down any such proposition. I did not believe then, nor do I now believe, that woman suffrage is a war measure. The gentleman is merely trying to justify his indefensible position. My record in this House since this crisis arose has been to stand by Woodrow Wilson, not because he was a Democrat but because he was the President of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Does the gentleman regard it as treason to ask for information?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I do not.

Mr. McCULLOCH. That is all that we are doing here.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman can not excuse himself in that way. The American people will accept your action to-day either as not standing by our representatives in France and embarrassing them or encouraging them and upholding their hands.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Then, in order to get justice, we must pay tribute.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. If the gentleman thinks that, then well and good.

Sirs, I am heartily in favor of this legislation. I am in favor of every piece of legislation that our representatives in France believe will aid in the slightest degree in securing a speedy and just settlement of the issues of the war upon the enunciated principles of our President. I have never, up until this good hour, since this crisis began cast a single vote or given expression to a single sentiment that would hamper my Government and its representatives. And I shall pursue that course when I have left the activities of this body to take up my duties in the other end of this Capitol. I shall be moved by the same purpose, namely, to stand by the representatives of this Government in their peace negotiations and to wage war upon everyone who is its enemy. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Kansas how many speeches are to be made on that side?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Only one.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I shall submit one or two observations very briefly. Now, I am not going to criticize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. I am not going to charge that he made a demagogic speech, but I am going to say this: There are a few gentlemen on the Republican side of the aisle, and possibly a few on this side of the aisle, whose position is always known before they speak. Whenever they arise to address the House the House knows in advance what is coming. When the gentleman from Iowa arose both sides of the House knew exactly what to expect—a bitter speech and abusive of the President of the United States.

It is said we need more information. What more information can the House of Representatives desire? The President of the United States has gone in person to Europe. Whether you criticize the wisdom of his trip or not, he is there. He has had opportunity to consult with the representatives of all the nations of the world, and after careful investigation he cabled to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this House that $100,000,000 is urgently needed in order to save people from starvation. Do you want additional evidence? We have appropriated billions in the prosecution of this war, but we must hesitate here, we must quibble, we must play politics, because that is what is being done here to-day, in response to the request of the President of the United States that he needs $100,000,000 to save certain peoples of Europe from starvation. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, Republicans and Democrats, we shame ourselves if we turn down that request, we shame our Nation if we turn down such a request as this. I think you Republicans may well set a precedent here and now. You will soon be in control. The next House of Representatives is yours, and I make this prediction: You will be appropriating money for this very object, because we are all Americans, and while our prejudices may get the better of us for a short while, there is no red-blooded American who is going to let women and children starve anywhere on earth, if he can prevent it. That is the plain issue that is presented here to-day. People are starving now. We alone have the food. Shall we save them or let them die? You must answer to-day.

Mr. Speaker, I can not for my life understand this constant criticism that we hear of Herbert Hoover. I have heard arguments actually advanced that gentlemen would not vote for this appropriation because Hoover was going to spend the money. What has Hoover done to justify any charge against him? He has proven himself the most efficient man that could possibly have been found throughout the length and breadth of civilization. He has handled tens of millions of dollars, and up to this good hour, so far as I know, the finger of suspicion has never been pointed at him. But it is "that man Hoover." Because Hoover, having a thankless job—a job that nobody wanted—has had the courage to stand up and do his duty he is to be criticized, and that is to be used as an excuse for opposing this bill! Mr. Speaker, I conclude by saying this: Whatever may be said about the House of Representatives, it is American on both sides of the aisle, and this request coming from the President of the United States for $100,000,000 to save people from starvation is not going to be denied by Americans in this House. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time—nine and a half minutes—to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is an occasion when we are determining whether we shall act from judgment or from emotion, whether what we do is the result of a logical conclusion of reasoning or a mere impulse. Thus far the proponents of this measure are undertaking to force conviction by attempting to make it appear that the opposition is merely partisan and political. I merely rise to state that kind of statement is not argument. If it should so appear that one side opposes a proposition and another favors it, why should not the side opposing it say to the side that favors it that they are putting it purely upon a partisan basis? Why should not the Republicans say that the Democrats are making it a partisan matter? I do not make that charge against the Democratic side, and they have no right to make that charge against the Republican side—that the opposition to this resolution or authorization is purely partisan, that it is in order to embarrass the President. It was so stated—that we must pass it or it will embarrass the President. That was stated on the floor here, and it has been stated elsewhere. If the President is to be embarrassed, it is not by our vote; but it probably is his indiscretion that makes it an embarrassment which our vote will not relieve. It has been also stated that we must do it to reduce the danger of the Bolsheviki movement. That was stated on this floor and it has been stated in the argument for this bill. I would suggest that one of the best ways to reduce the evils of bolshevism is not by undertaking to bribe it in the shape of food nor by undertaking to flirt with it, but is by undertaking to deal with it by law, as has been too often noted in and out of official life, especially as it is found in our own country. My opposition to this measure is that it is of doubtful wisdom to pay out of the Treasury of the United States, whether the funds come by taxation or by loan, public money collected for specific purposes on demand on the part of a foreign government when war no longer continues. I voted with the rest of you to authorize the loans to the foreign governments during war. While they were not our allies, we were associated with them and the purposes of the two were the same. Therefore I did not hesitate to vote for authorization of loans; but let me say to the Democratic side of the House it is a source of criticism to borrow money from our own people at a certain fixed rate and loan it to foreign governments—even to our allies—at the same rate when those very governments loan to their own people at from 2 to 3½ per cent greater than we are loaning to them. [Applause.] I raise the question of discretion, whether because we did it in time of war—a doubtful thing in its wisdom even then—we should continue to do it when war no longer exists; and, for one, I shall not hesitate to withhold my support of this proposition. I will not now agree to take out of the Treasury of the United States, whether it be replenished by taxation or loan, in both of which cases it comes from the people—from the earnings of our own people—money to lend to any other country when war has ceased. So much for that phase of the opposition.

There is another phase, and that is the manner in which this gift is asked. I am at the point where I shall cease to vote further an indiscriminate amount of money in unlimited quantities to any single individual to use at his own discretion, I do not care who that man is. [Applause.] The hundred million dollars is but the beginning. If it is right, and we are justified in voting $100,000,000 because it is asked for, then we must by the same force vote the next $100,000,000 that is bound to be asked for. There is no limit to this thing, and as a representative of the people of one district in Ohio I regard myself as the trustee of the burdens they are called upon to bear to conduct this Government, and while I shall give of my own to the very limit of my ability for a charitable purpose, I shall leave my people to do likewise, and will not give of their own earnings without their consent. That is a phase of opposition to this bill that I can not overcome. The bill says it is to feed the people outside of Germany. It was not so stated at first. Only this morning the press quotes Mr. Hoover as saying that by spring Germany would be upon the verge of famine. It is coming from every source that the German Bolsheviki movement is producing nameless distress in Germany, and if our purpose is to prevent this movement, and you ask this bill upon that basis, then are you going to send it to Germany? I do not commit a breach of confidence, but we have been told that this side of the House, with that side of the House, will soon be voting appropriations out of the Treasury to feed the German suffering people. Before we embark upon such a campaign it will be well for us to wait until we hear from our own sons, some of them in German prisons, as to the treatment of Americans at the hands of Germans. If we are to legislate by emotion rather than upon a rational basis, let the Congress study the attitude of our enemy toward our own and our associate peoples.

Before we set out on the basis of preventing the Bolsheviki movement in Germany and retarding it in other lands of Europe let us first look to our own household, take care of our own interests here. Of course, there is suffering, war is inevitable to produce suffering, but let the Red Cross organization set out the facts and then let us appeal to our own people who will meet the issue. Let us proceed upon that basis to raise this fund and I will vote for it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twelve minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining 12 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the day the armistice was signed most of us in America mentally took off our war clothes and hung them in the closet and immediately proceeded to get out the old peace suit that we had worn years ago and said, "Now, let us go back to old conditions," And while that may be a very natural desire it is a long ways from being a possibility and the one thing that the people of America need to bear in mind, not only in considering this proposal which is now before the House but in many that are to come hereafter, is that while fighting has ceased we have not reached a condition of peace and that the world has not, and perhaps can not, save through many days of bitter travail, go back to the old conditions, and men's minds that refuse a recognition of that fundamental fact are minds that refuse to keep pace with the movement of the world and of the times. [Applause.] And for us to stand here and speak of and deal with the proposal that is now before the House as we might have dealt with such a proposal 4 or 5 or 10 years back or 4 or 5 or 10 years forward is to ignore facts that stare every man in the face. I had hoped that the need of this proposal would so appeal to men that there would be no great division upon it. I recall what the gentleman from Illinois alluded to. How there came a message from President Roosevelt to the Congress of the United States asking $800,000 to be voted for the relief of the people of Italy who were suffering from a great eruption, a great earthquake. It passed the Committee on Appropriations unanimously and it came out on the floor and went through the House and Senate unanimously. Some one suggested, was it given to the President to do as he pleased with. The act is quite brief, it is so short that I think it is worth reading:

> That to enable the President of the United States to procure and distribute among the suffering and destitute people of Italy such provisions, clothing, medicine, and other necessary articles, and to take such other steps as he shall deem advisable for the purpose of rescuing and succoring the people who are in peril and threatened with starvation, the sum of $800,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.
> In the execution of this act the President is requested to ask and obtain the approval of the Italian Government, and he is hereby authorized to employ any vessels of the United States Navy and to charter and employ any other suitable steamships or vessels.

No limitation of any kind or requirement for report as to expenditure, no audit but a blanket appropriation that was most gladly voted to Theodore Roosevelt, knowing that he, like every other President of the United States, was honest and could be trusted in great emergencies to deal in the interest of the country that has given him its highest possible office. Now, so much for that. Everyone who has spoken in opposition to this proposal has spoken on the assumption that America was undertaking to do a thing of its own accord without consultation and without cooperation of the allies, with whom it has been working since our entrance into the war. I deny it. I state that there is to-day in existence an interallied commission for the purpose of the distribution of food and of relief to these people, and I will read to the House the names of some of the men who are on that commission.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Just briefly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman state when that commission was appointed?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I will give the gentleman such information as I have. I know what is in the gentleman's mind. He would have the impression to go out that the President and Mr. Hoover have forced the allies to enter into this scheme and that it is simply one that originated with Mr. Hoover and with the President. I deny it. I say to you that before the cable from the President was sent to the Congress on the 2d of January there had already been an agreement in substantial form by the allied nations as to the creation of such a commission.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to proceed——

Mr. MADDEN. For a simple question. Does the gentleman know whether the allied nations, the entente allies, made any such appropriation or joined in such appropriations as is proposed to be made here?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not know whether they made appropriations, but I know they are furnishing food and transportation and actual relief while we are talking about it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, as the representatives of Great Britain, there are on the commission——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to complete this sentence without interruption. I want to be accommodating, but I have a limited amount of time. As the representatives of Great Britain, Lord Reading, ambassador to the United States, and Sir John Beale, chairman of the Wheat Executive Commission. On the part of France there is Clementel, minister of commerce, and Mr. Vilgrain, undersecretary of state for supply.

In regard to Italy, the information comes that their commissioners are on the way, and in their absence Signor Attolico, of the Interallied Food Council, is authorized to act for them. On the part of America are Mr. Hoover and Mr. Davis. Mr. Davis having been a representative of the Treasury Department who went abroad in order to represent them and who has been designated by the President in connection with this matter.

And so I repeat that this is not simply a proposal of the United States. It is likely true, I hope it is true, that the United States representatives urged that the head of that commission should be a representative of the United States of America. Most of the food must come from America, and, thank God, America is in a position to furnish that food without suffering and want to her own people. [Applause.] To my mind it is not a matter to be complained of, but a matter of congratulation, that America in this great reconstruction work is taking a premier part, a leadership, and that an American representative is to be at the head of the commission.

Now, much is undertaken to be said here about people favoring relief but objecting to method, and the same gentleman who in one moment says he would trust the Red Cross but would not trust the President, in the next breath complains because some one suggests partisanship. I do not suggest partisanship. Since this war started I have made no partisan speech. God knows the issues that confront the world are too big for any of us to let our little biases and prejudices control us. Though I believed the President and Mr. Hoover were thoroughly disreputable—and no man dares charge it or produces one scintilla of proof to justify it—yet they are the representatives of the American Government abroad. The President and those that sit with him are our representatives there, and they are our representatives in accordance with the Constitution that gives to the Executive the initiation of foreign affairs and of matters of treaty.

In the general debate I will read a telegram from Mr. White, the Republican member of the commission there, urging the passage of this bill and stating the need for it to be passed. I say to you that men who deny the need of relief in Europe deny it in the face of overwhelming facts. Why, there is not a man who can read a newspaper with discernment but that knows to-day that one of the very greatest, in fact the greatest, problem of Europe is the problem of food. And there is not a man who knows history but that knows that you can not talk reason to men whose bellies are pinching with hunger; that you can not get order and stability while men and women and children die of starvation.

It is not proposed to give this food to Germany. She has money with which to buy food, and she will have to pay for what food she gets from us or from our allies, and she will only get food then to the extent that we can give it after dealing with the needs of our allies and our friends. Austria-Hungary has gone to pieces. In what composed that dual monarchy are now several groups of people, our friends, who have not food. Roumania has not; Serbia has not. But the gentleman reads from a book about the mass of food that was found in northern Russia.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. It was there because of the absence of transportation. It was not there as an indication of surplus. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the rule.

The question was taken, and the rule was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Accordingly the House, in accordance with the rule, resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13708, with Mr. GARD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the participation by the Government of the United States in the furnishing of foodstuffs and other urgent supplies, and for the transportation, distribution, and administration thereof to such populations in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President from time to time as necessary, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, in the discretion of the President, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $100,000,000, which may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1919, and which shall be audited where practicable in the same manner as other expenditures of the Government are audited: Provided, That expenditures hereunder shall be reimbursed so far as possible by the Governments or subdivisions thereof or the peoples to whom relief is furnished: Provided further, That a report of the receipts and expenditures under this appropriation shall be submitted to Congress not later than the first day of the next regular session.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, three hours and one-quarter are prescribed for general debate.

Mr. SHERLEY. When I have used 10 minutes, I wish to be notified.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When will amendments to the bill be in order under the rule?

The CHAIRMAN. After the expiration of the general debate, I am informed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What course will one pursue who desires to offer an amendment? To give notice during his speech or wait until the expiration of the general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the five-minute rule after general debate.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I did not quite understand what the gentleman said about the time for offering amendments to this bill. It is all one section, I assume. Is it to be assumed that the bill will not be read again, but that the amendments can be offered at any time when the bill is under consideration under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the bill will be read under the five-minute rule, and at that time amendments may be offered.

Mr. MADDEN. It will be read as one section?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In view of that ruling by the Chair, I inquire whether it will be permissible to debate the amendment when offered under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. In the time prescribed by the rule, on presentation to the committee.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNER. As I understood the Chair to state, he recognized the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] for three hours.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the Chair stated he recognized the gentleman from Kentucky for the time prescribed under the rule, which was one-half of three and one-quarter hours. The gentleman desired to consume 10 minutes only at this time.

Mr. TOWNER. And this side will be recognized for one-half the time?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Chair will, of course, credit me with this time, which I have not used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized from now.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the bill is very short. It provides for an appropriation of $100,000,000 for participation by the Government of the United States in the furnishing of foodstuffs and other urgent supplies, and for the transportation, distribution, and administration thereof, to such populations in Europe outside of Germany as may be determined upon by the President from time to time as necessary, and for each and every purpose connected therewith in the discretion of the President.

There is then provided that expenditures hereunder shall be reimbursed as far as possible by the Governments or subdivisions thereof or by the peoples to whom relief is furnished. It provides that, so far as practicable, there shall be an audit of expenditures, and it provides that there shall be a report made at the next regular session of Congress of all receipts and expenditures under the fund.

It has been estimated that it will require something like a billion and a half dollars' worth of foodstuffs to supply Europe's needs this coming year. It is believed that something over $300,000,000 will probably have to be expended by the allies in the way of either gift or loan of foodstuffs to the suffering peoples. The condition in Europe is bad beyond description. I have here any number of cables from abroad touching the conditions in various countries. In Vienna the food shortage is very great; in Roumania, in Serbia, among the Czecho-Slovaks, in a large part of Russia. There will be this coming year several millions of people who will die in Russia from starvation in spite of anything that anybody can do for them, and no man can exaggerate the actual condition of want that exists.

Bolshevism is constantly spreading westward. It has overrun Russia. It is practically overrunning Poland. It threatens to engulf all of Germany. The remedy for it is one of two things—bullets or bread. You can stop Bolshevism by killing all of the Bolsheviki, but you can also prevent the spread of it by helping starving people to live.

I believe the people of America prefer that method to one of continued warfare. I do not believe that it is possible to have stable governments with which the peace conference can deal without some preliminary relief in the way of food to many of the peoples involved.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not want to disturb you in your line of thought, but you spoke of Russia and the enormous number of people who will die of starvation there in the coming year. Now, I assume, but perhaps the gentleman knows, however, that the great mass of those people are in the interior of Russia, and the cities and the more congested portions are under the control of these revolutionists, the Bolsheviki, who control the transportation. What I want to ask is a practical question: How do you expect, within two or three months which you give as the time in which this starvation would take place, to get this food to those starving people?

Mr. SHERLEY. To those starving people I do not expect it. That is the reason why I stated that a million or more would die of starvation, irrespective of anything that could be done. But if the people for whom this fund can be used can be reached, such starvation will not come to them. They can be reached, and they are being reached already. Our allies are doing what they can. England is feeding Serbia. Italy is helping. Food is being given to Roumania. We are also selling food to neutrals, and there can be, and will be, real relief over a great area.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] has just said that the starving people in Russia are principally those in the interior. The President's letter says, "Extended investigation and consideration of the food situation in certain parts of Europe disclose that especially the urban populations in certain areas" are faced with absolute starvation, indicating that it applies to cities as well.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is no question but that in great parts of Russia there is great suffering that can not be relieved.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What, if any, funds are now in the Treasury which would be available for the purpose sought for in this bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. As far as I know of, there are no funds in the Treasury, except such balances as may exist in connection with the President's fund, which can be used in his discretion.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman state what is left of that $100,000,000?

Mr. SHERLEY. I could not state. I have no doubt that some of the moneys have probably been given by the President out of his fund in connection with food relief now, because this food situation is pressing hour by hour and day by day.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. Can the gentleman give us some information as to what some of the other powers are doing in the way of financial assistance along the same lines?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not able to give the gentleman any information regarding any detailed proposition in dollars and cents that France and Great Britain and Italy will contribute, but I am advised by the State Department that all of them have agreed to carry their share of the burden and do all they can in this great relief; that England is now actually furnishing large quantities of foodstuffs to Serbia, that she is also furnishing other foodstuffs elsewhere and transportation, and that Italy and France are helping; and there is nothing to warrant any one in the belief that our allies are not in good faith proposing to cooperate to the extent of their abilities.

In that same connection it must be borne in mind that, speaking by and large, the food, as distinguished from money—the actual food—must come out of America, because only in America are any large surplus stocks.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman believe that any of the funds that will be realized from the proposed issue of bonds could be used for these purposes without further legislative authority?

Mr. SHERLEY. I know of no authority that exists for the use of those moneys for this purpose directly. Presumably the Secretary of the Treasury, if he saw fit, under existing law could make advances to our allies, and the allies in turn might agree to use that money for relief work.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, under the gentleman's theory, he might use some of it?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. We might not use it; we could loan to our allies and might, if we wanted to, make a gentlemen's agreement as to how they would use the moneys loaned to them. But there is no law that I know of that authorizes expenditures out of the Treasury in the way of gifts or foodstuffs to the starving people of Europe.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can I call the gentleman's attention to the limited phraseology that authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to advance funds to foreign governments? The gentleman need not answer unless he sees fit.

Mr. SHERLEY. The act speaks for itself. I speak only from memory. The gentleman from Ohio is familiar, of course, with that language, because he helped to report the bill and pass it, carrying the money.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, the phraseology shows that the Secretary of the Treasury is only limited to advance these credits to such foreign governments as were then engaged in war in cooperation with the United States.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if the gentleman will permit——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair admonishes the gentleman from Kentucky that he has already used 10 minutes of his time.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will use five minutes more. If the committee will permit, I will read from a cablegram of date of January 6:

> The British are already furnishing from army stocks food and clothing. Relief to Serbia and Syria, the Italians of South Austria. The British and French are advancing money for transport Belgian relief. Allies are willing and anxious to do all they can and have and will contribute to the full extent of their resources; but must be borne in mind that most of the food must be purchased in the United States, and American money would be used for such purpose and transportation.

Now, that cablegram has been followed by a number of others, all to the same effect. I repeat that I have no information as to the exact pro rata basis upon which the other Governments have agreed—if they have agreed—with America, as to this relief; but, knowing the amount of money that is being asked, knowing the extent of the relief that is needed, I do not believe that $100,000,000 at this time represents an undue contribution on the part of America in the solution of these tremendously pressing matters. And I do not share at all with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] his fear that because we vote $100,000,000 we will be compelled to vote other sums ad infinitum. I believe that he and I believe that I and those who come after us will have intelligence enough to deal with situations as they arise, and I know of no case that can be stated—the gentleman is a logician—that can not be destroyed by carrying it to the absurd degree of the fears of those who are opposed to it. Anybody can by speculating that this means something else—and it is pure speculation—draw the conclusion logically, if he chooses so to call it, that therefore the thing should not be undertaken.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman stated "knowing the extent of the relief required." Where have we any definite knowledge as to the extent of the relief required? Is it not true that this is a mere guess?

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, the gentleman may quibble about the word "definiteness." I do not know how to get in time definiteness of information as to the money it is going to cost to feed starving people while they are starving. I do know, however, that men whose business it has been to make a survey teli us what in their judgment will probably be necessary; and having in mind the exigencies, physical, political, and social, that exist, I consider that that is as definite as practical men ought to want, and that a man who insists upon the definiteness that comes from a census enumeration is either fooling Limself or undertaking to fool others as to the character of his opposition to the matter.

Mr. FESS. It is easier to vote a mere guess, and that is what this is.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, the gentleman quoted his own fear. I prefer Mr. Hoover's estimate to the gentleman's fear.

Mr. FESS. How long has Mr. Hoover been over there?

Mr. SHERLEY. He has been over there for a month or more. He has had representatives there for many months, and we have been getting information since the beginning of the war as to food conditions.

Mr. FESS. And the request has been made since Mr. McCormick reached there.

Mr. SHERLEY. The request may have been made, but that again is evidence of wonderful logic. A man goes at a certain time. A request comes at a certain time. Therefore it comes because the man went there! I submit it again to the gentleman as an evidence of that conclusive character of logic which is being given us here to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The objection of the gentleman from Ohio finally was to the President expending the fund.

Mr. FESS. That is only one objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In the first five minutes of his remarks he stated that he would not vote to tax his people for this purpose. Then finally he said if the Red Cross would administer it he would vote for it.

Mr. FESS. I would. That is only one objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. But, if the gentleman please, I am not willing to discuss this question on the ground of personal opinions of individuals touching this man and that man. In all the abuse that has been heaped upon Mr. Hoover I have yet to hear any concrete evidence of wrongdoing on his part. I have yet to hear any fact that justifies distrust of him. He has performed for the world a great service in my judgment. [Applause.] But I say to you that we are faced with a situation where we have either to repudiate the representatives of the country because of our belief about men or go forward with this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used five additional minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. In the testimony taken before the gentleman's committee it is stated that Great Britain and France have already joined in an arrangement for the distribution of relief for these people, and that Italy is soon to join. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he had received information since as to just what organization is to distribute this relief—if it is interallied relief?

Mr. SHERLEY. I stated to the House that there would be two representatives each from England, France, Italy, and the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. They are to cooperate?

Mr. SHERLEY. And that the question of distribution, quantities, methods of transportation, and persons to whom distributed would be determined by this interallied commission.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. And I desire to state that as having been given to me authoritatively in a cablegram from overseas.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The gentleman has stated the fact that England is active in this matter. The public press carries notice that the British Government has canceled its contracts made with this country largely for the purchase of food supplies, upon the representation that they did not need any more. Now, the thing is going to occur that we are going to have a great surplus of wheat in this country if our crop goes on. Will not this money be available for the purchase of wheat in this country?

Mr. SHERLEY. I take it that practically every dollar of it which shall be expended in the way of food will be expended for food bought in America.

Something was said about the condition of food. There is a very large surplus of wheat in this country over our needs. This country is under guaranty to maintain the price of wheat that shall be offered for sale until June 30, and in addition to that this country has undertaken by agreement—not by law, but agreements that have been enforced in good faith—to maintain a minimum price for live stock that should be offered for sale. That has been maintained. There is a very large surplus of cattle, and particularly of hogs, over the needs of this country. That surplus can be used, and will need to be used, in Europe, but if we undertake not to export it you will immediately disturb and break to pieces the markets of the country.

I have no desire to maintain high prices. I know what some men will say, particularly those men who want to appeal to the unthinking, about the poor of our cities, that they ought to have relief, but I repeat again that we can not think simply in terms of our own geography in this day and generation. It would be a lasting disgrace to America if, having entered the war, our efforts should cease the moment the fighting had ceased, if we ceased to have any vision, and confined our views simply to the selfish desires of ourselves. [Applause.] If there be men so little of soul who want to think only in terms of selfishness, I say to those that, considering the standpoint of the Treasury, the expenditure is money well invested. I do not want to see the armies of occupation turned again into active warring armies in Europe. I believe, as I believe in my existence, that unless the allies solve some of the pressing problems of food that exist abroad, you will see a resumption of the fighting. I want the boys to come home. I want the boys here again. I am not afraid to risk $100,000,000 for feeding these people when I voted the huge sums for the prosecution of the war that I and my colleagues have voted in the past.

Now, I must not take longer time, in justice to those who are to follow. I want to read from a cablegram that was sent by Henry White to Senator LODGE, and I read it with the permission of Senator LODGE:

January 8, 7 p. m. For Senator LODGE from Mr. Henry White:
"Feel I should no longer delay laying before you condition which has been gradually forcing itself upon our delegation and which now dominates entire European situation above all else, namely, steady westward advance of Bolshevism. It now completely controls Russia and Poland, and is spreading through Germany. Only effective barrier now apparently possible against it is food relief, as Bolshevism thrives only on starvation and disorder. I consider it therefore of utmost importance that President's request for one hundred million appropriation for relief be granted at once. Impossible to inaugurate peace conference under proper auspices without previous adequate provision to cope with situation. Aside from stoppage of Bolshevism, I understand there is in United States considerable surplus of food accumulated at high prices, maintenance whereof guaranteed our Government or assurance under its auspices, and that it is necessary to dispose of this surplus in order to relieve warehouse and financial facilities, as well as prevent serious fall in prices, with radical break in market, which would cost our country more than the appropriation asked for. The appropriation is not for the purpose of advancing money to Germany, which will pay on a cash basis for any food sent there. Allies are already furnishing relief to liberated territories and are disposed to assist otherwise to extent of their available resources, but most of the food must come from the United States. I can not too strongly impress upon you urgency of meeting situation herein described."

I submit that for the consideration of those gentlemen who do not think any good can come out of Nazareth, and who are unwilling to accept any representation that the President of the United States or Mr. Hoover might make touching the matter. For the great mass of the people of America who believe that the President is earnestly and capably representing the people of the United States in this great work abroad, I desire to read this cablegram which I received from him on January 11.

I can not too earnestly or solemnly urge upon the Congress the appropriation for which Mr. Hoover has asked for the administration of food relief. Food relief is now the key to the whole European situation and to the solutions of peace. Bolshevism is steadily advancing westward, is poisoning Germany. It can not be stopped by force, but it can be stopped by food; and all the leaders with whom I am in conference agree that concerted action in this matter is of immediate and vital importance. The money will not be spent for food for Germany itself, because Germany can buy its food; but it will be spent for financing the movement of food to our real friends in Poland and to the people of the liberated units of the Austro-Hungarian Empire and to our associates in the Balkans. I beg that you will present this matter with all possible urgency and force to the Congress. I do not see how we can find definite powers with whom to conclude peace unless this means of stemming the tide of anarchism be employed.

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. I would like to ask the chairman what would be the effect of this phraseology of the bill on page 4:

Provided, That expenditures hereunder shall be reimbursed so far as possible by the Governments or subdivisions thereof or the peoples to whom relief is furnished.

Mr. SHERLEY. The legal effect is simply this: The money is given to the President to be used in his discretion. Of course that discretion could override that indication of the will of Congress, but it also has the great value of indicating that Congress expects the money expended for food and used for this relief to be recompensed where funds or securities are available. It is an indication of the intent.

Mr. EMERSON. And not binding?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not fully binding in a legal sense; the gentleman realizes that we can not give the President discretion in moneys to be expended and then bind that discretion. The gentleman will also realize that you could not compel the food to be given only for value, because that would destroy some of the main purposes of the bill and of the need of the situation abroad. We must leave it in the discretion of the President.

Now, I beg gentlemen that in the consideration of this matter they will consider that this country has been exceedingly fortunate, in that it has never yet had a President that it had to hesitate to trust touching financial expenditure.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a single suggestion?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I want to suggest to the gentleman that wherever it can be audited the bill provides that it shall be audited—a Treasury audit—and where it can not be it shall be reported to Congress at the beginning of the next regular session, and the House of Representatives can get at it if they think it was improperly expended.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, I want to say one other word in connection with what was suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. He read you here amid great glee on the part of one or two gentlemen the articles of incorporation of a company that had been incorporated to do business in Russia. The articles of incorporation providing that company might engage in every kind of business, I take it—and the gentleman from Connecticut will correct me if it is not so—is one of those blanket charters that the State of Connecticut permits to be granted to corporations to do business outside of Connecticut.

This is the important fact, and it shows the difference between insinuation and fact. The gentleman told you about this incorporation. He then stated that he presumed that this corporation would be used as a medium for the disposition of the funds, although there is not a scintilla of evidence to warrant that belief, and I deny that it will be so used; but I call attention to this fact: There was not a word of proof offered to show that any wrongdoing had grown out of the creation of that corporation. Let us carry back our minds a little while. I like sometimes to do so, though not to have it stay back. Let us go back to the time when there was a great deal of agitation in America over helping Russia with supplies, and that boots and shoes, as the common expression went, were of more value than soldiers and bayonets. It may have been very proper to have created a corporation as a medium whereby the Government and those merchants of America who wanted to send supplies through to Russia might be able to do it. Remember we were controlling, and we are still in large measure controlling, exports from this country. We were controlling its shipping and tonnage. The trouble is that gentlemen refuse to think about the unusual conditions that have surrounded the Government and that have made unusual remedies necessary; but what I ask is that before men vote against this relief proposal because of the creation of a corporation by the War Trade Board some proof be submitted that there has been something wrong, something corrupt, something unwise, something loose done by virtue of that corporation, and that it is to be the medium for doing similar things in connection with this fund.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The articles of incorporation which I read were not in blanket form but were an unusual form. The corporation was incorporated as late as December 2, 1918, and every dollar of the money, the $5,000,000, was given to that corporation by the President, that the War Trade Board holds the stock as directors, and the things provided for are unlawful under the laws of the United States.

Mr. SHERLEY. All right; I am willing to accept all of the gentleman's statements of facts, but I decline to follow his conclusion as a lawyer as to what constitutes unlawfulness. I should want to look further at the record. But take the case as stated. I personally would rather that all the stock be owned by the Government than that part of it be owned by the Government, and I think most men here would. I again submit to the House that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has not produced a scintilla of evidence to show that any wrongdoing has come out of the creation of that corporation. I do not want to take further time of the House now, but again I ask those gentlemen who are so persistent for detailed information to see to it that they do not follow fears, which they take for information.

Of the frightful conditions in Europe there can be no doubt. I will, under extension of remarks, place in the RECORD extracts from cables received from abroad showing some of these conditions. Of our ability to supply foodstuffs there is no question. We have a billion and a half dollars' worth of surplus food that we can and should export to Europe. Most of it will be exported and sold for cash. We are asked by this bill only to authorize the use of a hundred millions in conjunction with aid given by our allies to buy food for relief of those unable through regular channels and methods to obtain food. The need for such action is believed in not only by our representatives at the peace conference but by the allied Governments' representatives. The success, nay, the initiation, of the work of the peace conference is in great measure dependent on such relief work. Shall America give the lie to her statements of purpose, to that idealism that has been her guiding star in all the dark days of the war by refusing this aid? Shall she be not only so selfish but so lacking in creative statesmanship as to hold back because, forsooth, we can not say that each dollar we spend will be matched by one from each of our chief allies? This has not been her way of aiding humanity in the past. It will not be her way now.

[Copies of cablegrams received from time to time from American representatives relative to the food situation in Europe.]

JANUARY 6, 1919.

Very urgent. Rickard, Food Administration. Food 173. Your 118.

The British are already furnishing from army stocks food and clothing relief to Serbia and Syria, the Italians to South Austria. The British and French are advancing the money for transport Belgian relief. Allies are willing and anxious to do all they can, and have and will contribute to the full extent of their resources, but must be borne in mind that most of the food must be purchased in the United States, and American money would be used for such purchase and transportation. Your 107 as to using this revolving fund. It would, in effect, be such a fund, but it must be borne in mind that it would ultimately be absorbed in giving credits possibly over long periods to such peoples and institutions as our Treasury could not properly advance under the law, and some of it would be lost in sheer charity. This is not to replace Treasury advances to England, Belgium, France, Italy, Serbia, and Roumanian Government for the purchase of American food. The proposed appropriation would be entirely insufficient for these purposes. Might, however, later on be used to partially replace loans to Serbia and Roumania, but their urgent needs must in any event be cared for by the Treasury pending this appropriation. The matter is most urgent and forms the foundation for any complete arrangement with the allies fixing their participation. It would also furnish a large measure of relief to urgent surpluses, if prompt enough. There needs be great emphasis to all American officials and Congress that the armistice has left us large surplus of food that, if we are to dispose of it, we must give credits, and that, as the Nation trying to put peace on high-level ideals on which we went into war, we can not be niggardly in the world's greatest problem to-day—that is, How to get food. I need not repeat that strong liberal relief is to-day the only hope of stemming the tide of Bolshevism without the expenditure of lives and vast sums on military action. While it is urgently necessary to dispose of our surplus foods in order to relieve congestion and protect the producers from disaster and the consequent chaotic results, it is most fortunate for the saving of human lives that we have this surplus, and our country can not afford to fail to meet both emergencies.

HOOVER.

[Cablegram received Jan. 7, 1919, from Mr. Hoover.]

On area covered by new appropriation general situation of these countries is that their animals are largely reduced; their crops were far below normal, due to man and animal shortage, ravage, and climatic conditions. The surplus harvest above absolute needs is now rapidly approaching exhaustion, and consequently the towns and cities are in dangerous situation. Our reports show specifically Finland that food is practically exhausted in cities; that while many of the peasants have some bread other sections are mixing large amount of straw; they are exhausted of fats, meats, sugar, and need help to prevent a renewed rise of bolshevism.

Baltic States: Food may last one or two months on much reduced scale; they sent deputation to our minister at Stockholm imploring food.

Serbia: Town bread ration down 3 ounces daily in north; not accessible from Salonica. In south, where accessible, British are furnishing food to civil population; we are trying to get food in from Adriatic.

Jugo Slavia: Bread ration in many towns 3 or 4 ounces in all classes; short of fats, milk, and meat.

Vienna: Except for supplies furnished by Italians and Swiss, their present bread ration of 6 ounces per diem would disappear; large illness from shortage of fats, ration being 1½ ounces per week; no coffee, sugar, eggs; practically no meat.

Tyrol is being fed by Swiss charity.

Poland: Peasant probably have enough to get through; mortality in cities, particularly among children, appalling for lack of fats and milk, meat, bread; situation in bread will be worse in two months.

Roumania: Bread supply entire people estimated to last another 30 days; short of fats and milk; last harvest 60 per cent a failure.

Bulgaria: Harvest also a failure; supplies available, probably two or three months.

Armenia already starving.

Czecho-Slovaks: Large suffering; lack of fats and milk; have bread for two or three months; have sugar for six months. We have each country under investigation as to total amounts required to barely maintain life and their resources to pay. Preliminary investigation by Taylor and staff in connection with allied staffs show total above areas will require about 1,400,000 tons imported food to get through until next harvest, costing, say, $350,000,000 delivered.

JANUARY 9, 1919.

Further telegraphic message from Dr. Alonzo Taylor, who represents us in interallied food commission at Vienna. Taylor is assisted by Lieut. Col. Causey and Capt. Gregory of our Army. The situation in Vienna is extremely bad. Flour ration is 5 ounces per day; fat ration is 2 ounces per week; meat ration is 3 ounces per week. People living mostly on cabbages and turnips. The stocks are very low; practically matter of days. Prices are past all description. Unrationed butter, which can sometimes be obtained from illicit trade, is about $6 per pound. The allied commission has decided that 30,000 tons of foodstuffs must be immediately provided. Of this the Italians offer to provide 15,000 tons for immediate shipment. Condition is urgent. Are we authorized to state that we will supply? There is no practicable finance in sight at the moment except to take undertakings of some of the banks.

STOCKHOLM, January 9, 1919.

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington:

In connection with the proposed appropriation of $100,000,000 by Congress to assist in food relief in Europe I feel you would like to have the food situation in Finland and the Baltic Provinces. With this in view have asked Norman Anderson, of Commerce Department, who is with legation in Stockholm, to compile facts and figures for me, which I quote below. This will show you urgent need of some of these countries for immediate relief: "Early Finnish grain, importation and production, less seed grain, was in terms flour and thousand metric tons beginning summer 1913, first year imports 414, production 431; second, 257 and 421; third, 346 and 468; fourth, 237 and 419; fifth, summer 1917 to December 1918, 13 and 391. Total crop this autumn estimated 609 metric tons, of which half oats and only 1 per cent wheat. To supply three and one quarter million population Finland with 300 grams flour daily per person Finland requires about 355,000 metric tons flour per year. Finnish Food Commission, Stockholm, estimates present stock flour Finland 246,000 metric tons consisting 71 per cent rye, 20 per cent barley, 7 per cent oats, and 2 per cent wheat. Shortage therefore flour of about 110,000 metric tons, equivalent to 120,000 metric tons grain which must be imported for this year's requirements; estimated needs for seed, and animals 461,000 metric tons, of which present stock Finland is about 300,000, and 160,000 metric tons must be imported. Total grain imports necessary this year's requirements for flour, seed, and animals about 29,000 metric tons. From 11,000 tons recently authorized from Scandinavia, about 2,000 tons already shipped to Finland. Grain stocks on hand in Finland do not tell true story of situation. Southeastern part of Finland agricultural and producers hold grain on hand for own consumption, estimated that about 2,000,000 of population produces and consumes most of food on hand. Helsingfors and western and northern regions, rocky soil and lakes, unproductive and always dependent on Russia for grain import long since cut off. Great deprivation in these districts. Bread consisting of oats, moss, and cellulose; very bad bread; ration, 80 grams daily, 40 grams extra for workers to million card holders.

"Urgent need in Finland for pork, sugar, fats, and dried fruits imports. Normal Finland produces about half pork requirements. No stock left, and this year's requirements pork estimated 25,000 metric tons, of which 5,000 to 10,000 needed immediately. No sugar on hand, and estimated year's requirements 15,000 metric tons. This year's requirements cocoa, fat and butter substitutes estimated 15,000 metric tons, and dried fruits 12,000 metric tons. Negotiations now under way to supply Finland with herring from Norway. Varying food conditions Baltic States comprising Esthonia, Courland, and Livland. Large stocks on hand Esthonia, which normally reports food plenty reported Revel at low prices; Esthonia stocks threatened, however, Bolshevik invasions; conditions may change any day. Livland and Courland normally self-supporting, but since war Russian German armies took available stocks. Germans been requisitioning 200,000 poods, or 3,200 metric tons grain from Courland and Livland per month. Recently Bolsheviks taken and destroyed remaining stocks and reported conditions acute, especially in cities Riga, etc.; estimated food requirements, Baltic States, being prepared by Baltic States commission, Stockholm, will be cabled next day or two."

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington:

For Polk. Have following telegram, January 3, from Polish Government, Warsaw:

"In view of the famine in Lithuania, Silesia, and Lwow, in order to satisfy the minimum needs of the indigent population of all Poland with Lithuania, Silesia, 60,000 tons of flour are needed immediately. There is a need of 45,000 tons of flour per month in January and February and 30,000 tons of flour per month in March, April, May, June, and July, a total need of 300,000 tons of flour. The below-given indicated quantities must be comprised in the monthly needs. The duration of these monthly needs comprises eight months; that is, beginning with January until month of August, inclusively. Six thousand seven hundred fifty tons of peas, kidney beans, and oatmeal; 5,625 tons of sugar; 1,875 tons of rice; 8,400 tons of preserved meat, above all, lard; 2,250 tons of fish and herring; 600 tons of condensed milk; 15 tons of cheese; 180 tons of butter; 600 tons of vegetable and animal fats; 375 tons of tea; 90 tons of cocoa; 30 tons of pepper; 15 tons of saltpeter. In view of complete exhaustion of all storage, there is a need of clothing, shoes, and underwear for 10,000 inhabitants, counting per person a pair of shoes, 3 meters of material for clothing, and 6 meters of linen. There is a need of medicines and bandages. We will communicate to you on occasion the great necessary quantity of same. For the transport of the above-mentioned cargoes of the ports of Gdamsk, Krolewiec, and Libawa, 3,300 covered wagons and 110 locomotives are necessary.

"It is indispensable to give up as soon as possible to the Polish Government the railroads, with rolling stock: Gdamsk, Mlawa, Gdamsk, Toran, Libawa, Bialystok.

"Communication with the white Russian regions of Lithuania and Podalsie is impossible in view of the fact they are still invaded by the Germans, who clear the country of the last reserves and the Bolsheviks massacre the population."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has used 31 minutes, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] for 97½ minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that any difference in the Committee on Appropriations has been brought to the floor of the House, certainly during this Congress, and for one I genuinely regret it. Of course there have been differences in the past, but we have buried them in the committee and united when we came onto the floor of the House. This time the division in the committee was very close, and I felt it my duty to oppose this proposition. My opposition is based fundamentally on two reasons: First, we have not the information sufficient to warrant this House in entering upon such a vast plan of future operations such as this; second, before the United States begins to act as the almoner of all Europe some arrangement should be made with our allies so that we should with harmony and with fairness amongst us all support these impoverished nations. Those are substantially the two reasons because of which I felt obliged to oppose this appropriation. Up until now, as far as I remember, every request of the President has been granted. While the war lasted both sides of the House felt that the wishes of the administration should be their wishes, and when a request was made to us we granted it without much consideration. We sometimes felt, I think, that quite possibly some of these requests were cloaks to cover propositions not directly connected with the war, but we did not propose to take the risk of putting our suspicions into a negative vote, and we granted what was asked. Of course the most notable illustration that will come to every man's mind of that was the bill relating to the telegraphs, under which the cables were taken over after the armistice had been declared. I have no regret that I acted favorably upon all of the requests that were made. But now the war is over, now the emergency which compelled us not to make scrutiny and investigation has passed, and, although I am not from Missouri, from now on, when requests are made, I must be shown that they are reasonable, and I think that that is the proper attitude for the House to take. It is always true in case of war that vast powers are given to an Executive. History shows that one of the dangers to a Republic is that in time of war unreasonable powers are given to the Executive, which, in time of peace, are still desired and retained. Therefore when peace comes the good of the Republic requires that scrutiny should again be exercised, and that this House should legislate not simply because it is requested to legislate but upon its own motion.

Therefore I think it becomes us in the future to resume the functions which we abdicated practically for the time of the war, and I think the country expects that now this House will pass upon appropriation bills and other bills upon their merits, and that we shall have shown to us the facts upon which legislation shall be based. I was very much surprised that my friend the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations should say a few moments ago that he did not think we ought to ask for further information. That differs greatly from his ordinary attitude toward appropriation bills. Why, what have we to support this? We have simply a cablegram from the President requesting us to pass this legislation and an echoing cablegram from one of his fellow members of the peace delegation. Those are all of the facts that we have. Why should we not have more? Why should we not be told what they presumably have before them? You say there is not time. We have had a delegation in Europe investigating this for several months. This whole subject has been investigated in cooperation with the other powers of Europe, and yet Congress is absolutely in the dark. We do not know how much famine is oppressing the nations of Europe. We do not know where they need the food. We do not know whether this $100,000,000 will tide us all through or whether it is just the first one hundred million and we have to follow it on with hundreds of millions after this. And before we embark upon what may be a policy which will cost this Government a billion of dollars, I think we ought to wait until the facts from Mr. Hoover or his agent or whoever has been made the investigators shall have come over here. They should have come over in time to inform us when this proposition was first before us. There is going to be delay because of the President's absence, because he did not appoint anybody to perform his duties while he is gone, and for that reason it is going to take an extra week before this bill can become a law, and when one coordinate branch of our Government is out of the country engaged in world affairs it is peculiarly imperative that one of the other branches of the Government should look out for the interests of America. And I think now that the war is over we are expected to give some attention to economy.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman wish to interrupt me?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman referred to the question of time. We passed a bill in reference to the transportation of clerks home. It was presented to the White House on December 19 last. The authorities received a cablegram on January 10 that the President had signed the bill. The gentleman referred to a week. There was a matter about which there was no controversy, and the time elapsed was from December 19 to January 10.

Mr. GILLETT. Of course, that increases the strength of my argument, but it also emphasizes the feeling which a good many people have, that before the President went over he ought to have appointed somebody to perform his functions, and while he is away it does not mean we are to accept every cabled request without investigating it fundamentally. Now, the Members want to appreciate that this bill is the exercise of an entirely new function by Congress.

It is the function of feeding a starving world. The constitutional power, I suppose, would be greatly doubted, especially by that side of the House. We have once or twice, in the case of Martinique and in the case of Italy, granted appropriations which were mere benefactions; but as a rule we have recognized in this country that when charity was to be performed it was to be done not by the Government but by the people of the United States, and such an organization as the Red Cross, such an organization as has recently been formed to assist the Armenians, those have been the agencies by which charity is to be performed. Now, when we are entering on a phase of charity greater than this world has ever dreamed of before, when we are going to say we will feed the hungry of the whole southwest of Europe, we ought to be deliberate and have the facts put before us. Why, my friend said that there is only one way to stop the spread of Bolshevism, and that is food. Now, if we knew that food would stop the spread of Bolshevism, that certainly would be a tremendous argument in its favor; but it is a mere assumption——

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. No; I can not yield; others want time and I am compelled to speak in haste. That is a mere assumption. Of course, hunger and suffering of any kind always makes a person discontented with the existing government; but upon that theory, giving of food to Russia would make Russia satisfied with existing government, which is the Bolsheviki, and it would make Poland satisfied with the existing government.

Now, just how extreme this famine is, just what sections of Europe need to be covered, I do not know, and we ought to know. Why, my friend speaks about the allies supplying them now. They are supplying them, if I understood it correctly, out of the Army stores, and the United States is doing that to-day. The United States is sending to Italy and to the east Adriatic Army stores and supplies. That is against the law. But I do not criticize them. If the necessity demands it, let them do it; but there is a great distinction between supplying foreign governments from Army stores and making a vast appropriation of $100,000,000 for it, and, personally, I think before we enter upon that there ought to be an absolute agreement among the different nations of the world about the policy that shall be followed, about when and where and how it shall be distributed, and about the proportions which the different nations shall contribute. I do not want to be mean about it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. GILLETT. No; I can not. I am willing that the United States shall grant much more than its full quota, and I think our country is disposed to be generous, that it would be glad to give more than its share, but we want to have it understood that there is an agreement among the nations, and we do not want to do it in a way which will make our allies discontented. Now, I suspect—I suspect that this is not an allied proposition; that it is a United States proposition alone. The suggestions about keeping up the price of food are a commingling of commerce and charity. Are we doing this for charity or for the food products of the United States? If it is charity, as I think it ought to be, let us not combine it with something else; let us have it understood and have our motives justly suspected. There are suspicions—you have all read them in the papers—there are suspicions that jealousies have grown up between the United States Food Administrator and the food administrators of the allies, and that the allies think that the United States is trying to be too prominent and trying to get too much of the éclat of the distribution.

I do not suppose our allies will object to our giving all we please. Of course, they would like to have us give more than our quota—and I think we are willing to do so—but I think when we are entering on this enormous problem—this problem of furnishing food to the suffering of Europe—we want first to have the full cooperation and sympathy of our allies. I think what ought to have been done and what ought to be done now is to have our delegates at the peace conference agree, or our President agree with the leading men of France and Great Britain and Italy, upon some plan by which this distribution shall be made, and agree in general upon the proportion in which the different countries shall subscribe to it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. There has been an agreement by England, France, Italy, and the United States that this food distribution shall be by distribution at which each shall have its representatives.

Mr. GILLETT. But there is no agreement, so far as we are advised, as to the extent of it, as to the amount the different nations shall contribute, or as to anything about repayment. Has there been any such agreement?

Mr. SHERLEY. There has been no agreement as to the definite amount, except the statement that the allies were prepared to give their portion of it.

Mr. GILLETT. Where is that?

Mr. SHERLEY. I read it, or, if I did not, I will do so.

Mr. GILLETT. Do you mean it is in the hearing?

Mr. SHERLEY. I mean I read it here on the floor. I have a cablegram here, which I will pass over to the gentleman, that contains that.

Mr. GILLETT. Just a vague statement that they are prepared to do their share is not what I want. We ought to have, it seems to me, an agreement as to how and in what proportion the different nations shall combine. The natural way, I should think, but I may be quite wrong about it, is that when supplying food to one of these suffering nations we should take the notes and obligations of those nations, and then the allied nations practically indorse them jointly, so that in time, if they ever can repay it, the allies as a whole would be repaid. Some such system as that ought to be inaugurated. At any rate, before we are called upon to enter upon this vast new program I think there ought to be, first, information, some developed information, not a mere telegram saying it is needed; and then there ought to be some program which will extend into the future upon which the vastness of this whole intention shall be measured and conceived and prepared, so that we will know what we are undertaking.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I can not yield. The gentleman will excuse me.

One word more. The gentleman says bolshevism must stop. We all appreciate that, and yet bolshevism probably can not be stopped. It is spreading westward. I confess I think that anyone who has the ear of Europe could do no better service to his country and to the world than in not merely saying always what is agreeable to those he is talking to but occasionally dropping a timely and healthy suggestion that freedom involves responsibilities and duties as well as blessings [applause] and to suggest that the obligations of freedom mean the obligations of law and order, and that no nation and no people are fit for freedom who do not respect the rights of others as well as their own. And so it seems to me that we could perhaps meet bolshevism occasionally by an argument as well as with food. But we have no assurance that food is going to stop bolshevism. It is entirely an assumption. Of course, it makes a plausible argument. But this is just a practical question: Shall the United States Congress appropriate $100,000,000 without knowing for what it is to be spent in any detail at all and not knowing how much our allies will cooperate? Those are the two grounds on which I oppose this resolution.

It is disagreeable, of course, to oppose any proposition for charity. The popular side is always to say, "Here are famine-stricken sufferers; will you not relieve them?" and, of course, everybody says "Yes." And the people of the United States, I am sure, want to relieve suffering, as everybody in this House does. The people of the United States will contribute out of their own pockets, if not out of the United States Treasury. If it is necessary to contribute out of the United States Treasury they will gladly do that. But before they do it I believe they want to know the facts upon which it is based, and they want to know what the other nations of Europe, with whom we are in alliance and who are equally responsible, will do. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask how much time the gentleman has used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has used 14 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] use some of his time.

Mr. GILLETT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. As a member of the Appropriations Committee I voted against this measure, and nothing has occurred since it was reported to the House to change my opinion. As has already been stated, it is not a popular thing to oppose a measure that has for its purpose the distribution of alms to those who are starving. But it occurs to me that we should reach a point presently where we should distribute our charity with some degree of intelligence and where we have some idea as to the character of program that is to be pursued in the distribution.

If these hearings have amounted to anything they have informed us that this is just a beginning. When the end will be nobody knows. There is no information in these hearings with reference to the extent of that suffering, or where we should commence or the amount we should distribute here or there or yonder. All of that we are told must be left to the discretion of this newly organized body for the distribution of food upon the other side.

And here is a thing that strikes me as being a little strange, and perhaps some of the rest of you will have the same impression. The Red Cross is organized now, if you please, as it has never been organized before in the history of the world—an agency whose purpose, and prime purpose, is to relieve the suffering of the world.

They are organized all through that country which they say is affected and where they say the starvation exists. We have had no report for our edification gathered by the Red Cross. There has come no word from this great agency that they are not able to cope with the emergency. There has come no cry for relief from them.

Where does it come from? It comes, if you please, from a new organization that has been formed within a month. And who is at the head of that organization? Mr. Hoover. It is Mr. Hoover that is asking for this appropriation and not the President of the United States. The President of the United States is merely the medium conveying to the Congress the desire of Mr. Hoover, and the President of the United States was frank to say so in the telegram that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] read to the committee, wherein he said he hoped he [Mr. SHERLEY] would use all of his power to obtain the appropriation asked for by Mr. Hoover.

Now, then, gentlemen may differ with me with reference to Mr. Hoover. I think he is the most expensive luxury that was ever fastened upon this country. I think he will continue to be the most expensive luxury with which we have to do if we still continue to give him unlimited power.

It has been said that we ought to congratulate ourselves because of the fact that we have an American at the head of this distributing committee. I deny that we have an American at the head of this distributing committee. He is an expatriated former citizen of the United States and he has never found it necessary to become repatriated. He did not come here in our midst during these trying days as a representative of the United States Government, to act and give his services for the benefit of the people of the United States. He came here as the agent of the allies, as their purchaser of food and food supplies, and that was long before we entered into this war. When we entered into it he was selected as the Food Administrator. Did Mr. Hoover resign his position as the purchasing agent of the allies for food supplies? No. He maintained that agency throughout and is occupying it now. Most paradoxical, these two positions. I dare say that the American people expected that he was their agent, solely and alone. He was not their agent except as it was to his interest to be their agent, he representing primarily the interests of the allies. Never before was such a paradoxical position of such great importance occupied by any man in the history of this country. Therefore I say there is reason for having more light and information on the subject when we are informed by the President of the United States who it is who is asking for this $100,000,000.

It has been said that there is no one who can point to a single item of misuse of power on the part of this man Hoover. I expect that when the final scrutiny comes, when the echoes of war have ceased to sound, when judgment reigns supreme again and reason has its sway and investigation is made to inform the people of the facts to which they are entitled, much can be said of the transactions of Mr. Hoover. As I said, and as I repeat again, if we had had an American citizen of the United States, interested with the citizens of the United States, at the head of this great food-supply business of the United States there would be a better feeling in this country, at least, and a belief in the minds of the American people that their interests were the prime interests in the mind of that Food Administrator. But when we know that every breath that he drew was drawn as the agent of the allies, and when we know that in every purchase he made he was acting primarily in the interest of the allies, and only secondarily in the interest of the United States, I think it is passing strange that the first cry that we hear coming from the other side asking that we contribute $100,000,000 comes not from the agency that we have trusted and found true in every respect for the relief of suffering over there—the Red Cross—but it comes from the man who has just suddenly gone over and had himself placed at the head of that institution, as he had himself placed at the head of the institution here, when it is only his secondary purpose to serve the interests of the United States in the position to which he is now appointed, because his prime object is to further the interests of the allies. This is the same unbiased gentleman who proclaimed through the public press on the day before the election last November that through the election of a Democratic Congress the President will not only save the lives of a million American boys and countless innocent women and children, but will enable him to attain a more complete "victory and a more permanent guaranty for peace than by any other means." This statement should be sufficient to condemn him in the minds of all men as being unfit for a responsible position of trust.

Now, it has been suggested here, if you please, that this money is to be expended for the most part in purchasing food supplies in the United States. The hearings do not bear out that assertion. The hearings, what little there is on that subject——

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Has the Government heretofore appropriated money for the Red Cross, or has that organization been voluntarily supported?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. So far as I know that has been voluntarily supported.

Mr. HARDY. And it has never asked money from the Government?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; and it is the exception when the Government is called upon to appropriate for charitable uses. Generally, when cries come for the relief of other nations, the people themselves take it upon themselves, through the Red Cross or some other agency of that kind, to raise the relief required. It is the greatest exception when the United States Government has done it. I suppose half a dozen times would cover all the times it has done it. There is no warrant of law authorizing it at any time, and if we pass this measure it will be without authority of law.

But I refer to the Red Cross for the reason that they have an agency everywhere. They are supposed to know all about the subject, the places where there is suffering; and if we propose to pass this bill in spite of there being no law to warrant it, and we want to get the greatest value possible for our money, why can we not give it to the Red Cross for distribution?

Mr. HARDY. Is not the Red Cross now urging in the most vigorous terms the passage of this bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have not heard of it. In the last Red Cross drive they got more than $100,000,000, when it was expected that this war would last a year or two longer, and they have got much of that money still unexpended. But whether they have much money or little money, I think it would have been wise—at least it would have furnished information for this committee—to have heard something from that agency. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] 40 minutes of my time.

Mr. CANNON. Forty minutes or forty-seven minutes?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman 40 minutes, and if I find myself able to do so I will be glad to give him additional time.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to minimize the force of the arguments that have been made in opposition to this measure. I shall support the measure with my voice and my vote, not in ignorance or denial of the force of those arguments, but because, after due consideration of them, while I find them persuasive, I do not find them conclusive or convincing.

I wish it were true that, having as representatives of the American people on their behalf assumed a tremendous responsibility in the world war, we had arrived at a condition where we might now honestly and conscientiously assume that responsibility had been discharged. We have not reached that condition. I wish it were true that having put our hands to the plow we had reached the end of the furrow and might properly turn back. I wish it were true that the signing of the armistice had brought peace and plenty, prosperity, and security in Europe, but it has not. We know—all the world knows—that famine gaunt and stark, attended by every horrid form of pestilence, marches on the receding waves of carnage, while crime and violence and all the devils of anarchy fatten and flourish in their wake. And what are we going to do about it? Deny our responsibility? Assume that we are in no wise further obligated over there? I wish that we might honorably do that. I am no more pleased than other gentlemen are with what I consider the pernicious practice of making sight drafts on Congress without notice or explanation. But we have been long accustomed to that practice. We should have become accustomed to it before now. This, however, is true: We have flung tens of billions of dollars into the cavernous maw of war in the past 18 months with less information as to the details of plans and purposes than we have touching this matter. So far as the major controlling and appalling facts of the situation are concerned, we are informed—all the world is informed. They are brought to us by every pulsation of the sound waves, by every click of the cables. We have 2,000,000 boys over there, and the heart of the Nation pines to have them home. If the appropriation of this sum of money, trifling compared with the billions we have heretofore appropriated—intended, at least, whether it accomplishes it or not, to stay the progress of famine and pestilence and the spread of anarchy—shall by one day hasten the homecoming of those boys, if it shall in any degree remove the danger and menace that our boys may be called upon to engage in the distasteful task of restoring order amid the chaos of eastern Europe, it will have been the best spent $100,000,000 we have appropriated since the war began. [Applause.]

I am not supporting this measure out of full and complete approval of presidential peregrinations, plans, or policies. Far from it. But I decline to take advantage of this measure in order to emphasize those disagreements. The President, under the Constitution, is our spokesman in the inauguration and the negotiation of the terms of peace. He has seen fit, in the carrying out of that duty, to bring himself in personal contact with the men charged with like responsibility in Europe. That is his affair. That is his responsibility. As our spokesman, as our voice on the watchtower, as the representative of America in the peace negotiations he has said to us that, in his opinion, our responsibilities under the conditions as he finds them require the expenditure of the sum we are asked to appropriate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. My time is limited, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What connection has this appropriation of $100,000,000 with what the United States is asking for from the peace commission?

Mr. MONDELL. If this appropriation of $100,000,000 shall relieve hunger, thereby giving people an opportunity to think sanely, and so shall stay the march of anarchy, it will have been the wisest and sanest appropriation we have made since the war began. [Applause.] I hope that in addition to relieving distress and pain and misery among men it may smooth the pathways of peace. [Applause.]

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Briefly.

Mr. IGOE. What does the gentleman think of the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], that the way to appease the hunger of these people is to stop them and argue with them and write them letters and notes?

Mr. MONDELL. I am rather inclined to feed them first. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, just one thing more. I do not altogether agree with the President. While he talks wisely and well of democracy, his attitude toward communications with Congress savors strongly of autocracy. But whether we agree with him or not, under the Constitution he is charged with a great responsibility. When the war began I stated that while the war lasted and until peace came I should consider it my duty to resolve the doubts I had in matters directly connected with the war in favor of the view of those charged with executive authority. I do not believe I shall be wholly relieved from the obligation of duty until around the peace table it shall be determined what our duties and responsibilities are touching the situation in Europe. Until that time comes I shall to a large extent resolve my doubts in these matters in favor of the view of the responsible executives of the Government, who in this case is the President himself. I decline to take the responsibility of in any degree or in any wise embarrassing or lessening the influence of America at the peace table by declining to accede to this request of the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I want to call attention to the observation made originally by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL], and repeated by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], to the effect that the United States Government and Congress appropriated hundreds of millions and billions of dollars simply for the purpose of killing and slaying people. I think that is the worst slander on the American Congress that I have ever heard on the floor of this House. We were assured by the President of the United States that the rights of citizens on the high seas had been unlawfully invaded, and those of us who voted for those appropriations voted to vindicate the sovereignty of the Nation and not for the purpose of killing and slaying. All of the evidence that we have heard in support of the resolution has been discovered outside of the hearings and in the testimony of persons who have no actual knowledge on the subject.

The President of the United States, in his communication to Congress, says this, and I read it:

I wish to appeal to the great sense of charity and good will of the American people toward the suffering, and to place this act primarily on a humanitarian basis.

Anything there about the Bolsheviki? Anything there about the necessity of this as a means of bringing about peace? Of course, gentlemen had no legitimate reasons in support of this measure and so they had to manufacture some. [Laughter.] The real truth about it is, and the theory upon which they have reported this resolution is, that by feeding the faces of the Bolsheviki you can bring about peace the terms of which he and his commissioners are in Europe to negotiate.

Now, the nations that have been engaged in this war are quite as much, in proportion to their resources, interested in bringing about peace as the Government of the United States, but if the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL] is sound, then the argument in support of all the peace commissioners adopting resolutions, as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], in behalf of all nations of Europe represented in the peace conference is sound, because if this is a peace proposition it ought to be vouched for by all the nations of Europe in the peace conference. Every one of the allied nations is represented there by their leading representative men. They are authorized to speak on this question. If that conference had adopted a resolution that this sum, or any other sum, is necessary and the nations would join in it and fix any proportion they might as the just proportion of the United States, I would vote the last dollar, and do it willingly and freely. If we had that statement from all of those charged with the responsibility of making peace that it was necessary, I would vote for it. But we have nothing but telegrams intended to drag this thing through Congress. I challenge any man in support of the resolution to state one scintilla of competent evidence that France, Italy, or England has appropriated one dollar in support of this purpose, or have agreed to do so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that Italy has fed the whole Serbian Army after the retreat, and sent food to Albania and food to Montenegro?

Mr. GORDON. That has nothing to do with this case, but was during the war, when Italy was getting licked and fed Serbia's soldiers for helping her. [Laughter and applause.] As I say, the hearings in this case disclose that Italy has not contributed one cent——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is not correct.

Mr. GORDON. For this purpose, and if the gentleman will read the hearings he will know more about this case than he does now.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am stating facts.

Mr. GORDON. But, gentlemen, we ought to consider this question properly. I repeat that there is not a scintilla of competent evidence that any one of these three nations has contributed, or agreed to contribute, one single dollar in support of this proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I stated that I held here in my hand, and I read from it and I will put it in the RECORD, a cablegram from the American representatives abroad to the effect that England, France, and Italy had agreed to bear their proper share and that they were actually sending foodstuffs——

Mr. GORDON. Through the army.

Mr. SHERLEY. And that they are actually transporting food for relief of these people. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. That is through the army.

Mr. GORDON. All through the army. Now, I took down that part of the cablegram that the gentleman read from Mr. White. Of course, a telegram from the peace commissioners, headed by Woodrow Wilson, would have more weight, but I took down what the gentleman from Kentucky read from Mr. White.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes; briefly.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman said he would accept a telegram from the peace commission. Are not the cablegrams that the gentleman from Kentucky read from the American peace commission?

Mr. GORDON. Oh, I object; I will make my own speech. I say, gentlemen, that the representatives of the European nations ought to take up this proposition if it is so momentous as is represented to us. I say if this obligation rests on the nations which have prosecuted this war and which have prosecuted it to final victory, the same obligation rests on them in proportion to the ability and power and resources as rests on the United States. I say to you that the ground on which the President of the United States placed the proposition in the telegram upon which the resolution was based, which was reported out of the Appropriations Committee, placed it solely on the ground of charity and good will.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Speaking about the contributions from Italy, the American Red Cross appropriated in Italy $3,583,826 and in Great Britain $1,885,750.

Mr. GORDON. We have had starvation in Italy ever since it got into the war. They could not feed themselves, to say nothing about feeding outside nations. I want to call attention to the fact that ever since we got into the war we have been underwriting the bonds of these nations.

I am willing to underwrite them some more, if it is necessary, for the purpose the gentlemen ask here, to wit, that you will not have any peace unless you feed these people. If that is so, then the obligation rests equally upon all of the allied nations, together with us, to feed them. I am willing to furnish the food, but I do say, as a matter of self-respect, the American Government ought to insist that an obligation, which is certainly equal upon each of these allied nations, ought to be recognized, and it ought to be recognized before we vote this $100,000,000. That is what I say, and there is no answer to that. The observations made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] have not been answered, and they can not be answered within the truth. These beautiful statements that, so far as they are able and find it convenient, these nations will undoubtedly do their share are exceedingly indefinite, and are statements upon which I would refuse to bind this Nation in the first instance. The matter was placed originally upon the ground of mere charity. What about the hundreds of millions that have been donated to the Red Cross? What was that donated for? Why did this Congress authorize national bank officers to take money out of their treasuries and donate it to the Red Cross, if it was not upon the theory that the doling out of charity was not a public function, as Mr. Hoover says it is, but was a purely private function, which individuals themselves must be relied upon to perform. That is the theory upon which everyone has been donating to the Red Cross. It is the theory upon which appeals have been made for the Red Cross ever since the war started—that donating to charitable purposes is not a Government function. Hoover is the man who discovered it was a Government function, and in passing we have been challenged to point to anything in the record of Mr. Hoover that has not tended to the benefit of the United States. Well, Hoover, as has been observed, was the purchasing agent for the allied nations to come over here to buy wheat. The Government of the United States put the monopoly of purchasing, along with the embargo, in his hands, so that he could fix the price of wheat, and he fixed it, and when complaint was made to him by a Member of the House that other grains were going up out of all proportion, including corn, he said, "You give me the right to fix the railroad rates and I will bring these rates down." That is to say, by the imposition of confiscatory railroad rates he could make the price of corn in Iowa $1 a bushel, in Nebraska 50 cents. In Missouri he could fix it at $1 and in Kansas at 50 cents. That is the power that Mr. Hoover wanted, but that is one of the powers that he did not get from Congress. The burden is upon those who undertake here——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the opposition to this bill is based on several grounds. One is that we have not sufficient information. Our good and explosive friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] a few moments ago asked for information coming from any source other than Mr. Hoover that the allies are cooperating in this work, and I then asked him to yield in order that I might read him this statement contained in the cable from the American mission.

Mr. KEARNS. What American mission?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The American peace mission. It sends this cable, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations had it with his cables there, and I picked it out from among them a moment ago:

All of the relief to Serbia has been and is contributed by England. England is also sending to Roumania two cargoes of flour and contributions have already been made by Italy.

The President of the United States has in his message said that there is an agreement between the allied nations to cooperate in this work. Mr. Hoover has in his cable said that the allied nations are committed to it. This cable says they are not only committed to it but the allies, without waiting for this Congress to act, have gone ahead with this work and are proceeding to relieve starvation, while the American Congress, or some part of it, hesitates and asks, as my good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] did, that a treaty be arranged among the nations in order to cover this. I presume he would ask that that treaty be arranged and then sent to the Senate for ratification, and in the meantime the people of Europe should be allowed to starve.

Mr. GILLETT. I did not suggest a treaty.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman says nothing should be done until the peace commissioners get together and agree. Then to bind this country it would be submitted to the Senate, and in the meantime the people would starve.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Who signed that paper?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is a cable from the American peace commission. So signed. My good friend from Ohio, Dr. FESS, stated one minute that he would refuse to vote to spend the money of the people of his district unless he received an indorsement or a direction from them, and in the very next minute he declared, in winding up his remarks, that if the Red Cross were intrusted with this work he would vote for it. The only objection is as to the method by which this proposed fund shall be used.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I can not yield unless the gentleman states that I am misquoting him.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman is misquoting me.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that I am, or used to be, a shorthand writer, and I took down his statement at the time, and if he looks at his manuscript he will see that he said that if the Red Cross handled this fund he would vote for it.

Mr. FESS. I said that, but I did not say that if I were instructed from my district——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What was the gentleman's language?

Mr. FESS. I said that I would not vote out of the Treasury money that was paid out of my district; that I would be willing to allow the people of my district to give, but I would not give their gift.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is a differentiation without any difference. The taxes of the people who live in the district represented by the gentleman go into the Treasury.

Mr. FESS. That is different from what I said.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. But he would not vote unless he got some direction. It is quibbling. The gentlemen who oppose this resolution are seeking for excuses. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] spoke about the War Trade Board and the appropriation of $5,000,000 in a lump sum from the President to that board to organize a corporation. Not one cent of that has been spent.

The War Trade Board assisted in the organization of the corporation because it could not conduct that work. By agreement of the allied council the nations atcing independently were to engage in this work, and this corporation was to go into Siberia and exchange food for commodities, such as furs, that those people own and which they could not bring to this country. When the armistice came they gave up the idea of carrying on work of that kind, and the only work——

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. And the only work of that corporation was to aid the War Department in furnishing food supplies to the Czecho-Slovaks who helped us in the war. I believe, gentlemen of the House, that the Republicans on the Committee on Rules——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. One more minute.

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina (continuing). The Republicans on the Rules Committee did not properly represent the Republican side of this House, and that the Republicans in this House will follow the Americanism of those gentlemen who stand here to-day in support of the President's request to aid the starving people of Europe. My good friend from Ohio says we should not attempt to destroy the Bolsheviki. My good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] says we should argue with them; we should not give them food. What argument would he make to starving men? The question is largely one of how we should treat that subject. Shall we handle it with force? By force Bolshevism can not be stopped; by food it may be stopped. You can win more of those people to stable government to-day with bread than you can with bullets.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. We have won the war, but we have not yet won peace. We can not hope to do so until stable governments exist where chaos and disorder now exist. The allied representatives believe that by contributions of food reason may return to those disordered peoples. Shall we refuse the appropriation and run the risk of forcing our boys in France to remain there for an indefinite period?

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield for me to ask a question?

Mr. GILLETT. I yield the gentleman a minute.

Mr. FOCHT. If I am correct, the gentleman said there was an agreement between the United States and the allied countries of Europe in regard to this matter. May I not ask the gentleman whether he does not believe it is high time the President or the commission or somebody of the so-called representatives of this country submitted to the American Congress these agreements, especially since the election on November 5?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is now submitted.

Mr. FOCHT. What does the gentleman think about——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I say it is now submitted to you. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FOCHT. Where is it?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is here in this cable.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman refused to give the names signed to the telegram.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I stated that it was the American peace commission.

Mr. FOCHT. Who is that?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman is so uninformed that he does not know who constitutes the American peace commission, it is useless to waste time in telling him.

Mr. FOCHT. Nobody else knows much about them, because we did not have anything to do with appointing them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest the gentleman from Massachusetts use some of his time.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is a poor cause that calls to its support vituperation and misrepresentation. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL] devoted the largest part of his remarks to denouncing the Republican members of the Committee on Rules as being wholly destitute of compassion, and he called upon the Republican Members of this side to repudiate them as being entirely unwilling to contribute anything to relieve suffering and starvation. Mr. Chairman, I know not what could have inspired this remark and why the further charge should have been made that those gentlemen were playing politics, except that the gentleman himself was smarting under the party lash administered by the party leader to drive him to this course. What is this awful crime with which the Republican members of the Committee on Rules was charged? What was their terrible conduct? That they were unwilling to relieve suffering and distress? No. They were as much willing to relieve it as the gentleman from Kentucky or any other man in this House.

What, then, was this misconduct on their part? It is that they were unwilling that the money of the American people, $100,000,000 of their money, should be spent without their knowing where and how it was going. They wanted to know in what countries this money was to be expended. They were unwilling in time of peace to grant powers that under such conditions had never before been given to kaiser or emperor. This is the whole of their offense. And what is it that the gentleman from Kentucky and some others on that side plume themselves so much upon? The great generosity of being willing to give away other people's money without knowing how it is to be expended or what was to be done with it. I confess that I can not get enthusiastic over liberality of that kind. I would rather know something about what is to be done with this fund before I vote for it. Mr. Chairman, we have had an unfortunate experience with these enormous appropriations which have been voted without let or hindrance, to be expended without any restriction, but we voted them under stress of war, in an emergency, under press of circumstances. While the war was in doubt, while the Germans were thundering at the gates of Paris, we had that for an excuse, but we have no excuse for such a course at this time. We have every reason, on the contrary, to say that now that the war is over, as the President himself has said, that these lump appropriations, voted to be expended entirely in the discretion of the person who expends them, should now stop. Gentlemen have said——

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not yield. I only have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Gentlemen have said we are lowering the influence of the President in Europe by opposing this appropriation. Mr. Chairman, I have heard many criticisms upon the President, some of which I indorsed and some that I did not, but I never heard it intimated until gentlemen on that side, the Democratic side of the aisle, brought it up that he was a man of so little ability and so little credit that he could not transact the duty of a peace commissioner unless he was given $100,000,000 to spend as he pleased. That is the position in which gentlemen on the other side are putting the President. It is not this side that is belittling him. It is the other side who say that unless he can have $100,000,000 he can not discharge the functions of a peace commissioner. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I would gladly support this bill if there was any check upon the expenditure which it authorizes. I would support it if the money was to be handled by the Red Cross, for this would give a check and balance by passing through its hands and would make use of that organization instead of requiring another to be created. As it stands, this immense sum will be expended with no check and no audit, except to find that it was authorized by the President. I can not approve the bill in that form, but I suppose it is hopeless to expect any amendments will be permitted. Gentlemen on the other side are determined that Congress shall relinquish all control over this fund, and, so far as this money is concerned, completely abdicate its functions, relinquish its powers, and abandon its duties.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in favor of this bill. [Applause.] I hesitated to favor it. When the proposal was first made the objections to the bill seemed in my mind to be greater than the necessities for the appropriation. Those objections, so far as my own attitude toward the bill is concerned, have not disappeared, but in spite of the objections, which I think I hold at their full value, the necessities require me to vote for this bill. It is not uncommon that I find myself forced to advocate one side or another of a question when there are good reasons on both sides. I do not think, either, that it is an unfortunate state of mind. I want to be able to see both sides of the question, and I do not want good reasons on one side to paralyze my mind when I consider the good reasons on the other side.

I would like to have more information as to the machinery that is to handle this appropriation. I should like to have more information as to the restrictions that are to be placed upon this expenditure. I do not need any more information as to the necessity for the relief of those people. We know what the condition of Europe is. We know that starvation threatens. This is a matter of common knowledge, about which we do not need to take special expert testimony. The men that are in the best position to know tell us that probably in those parts of Russia that we can not reach even after we pass this bill millions will die of starvation. Mr. Hoover, for whose opinion on such subjects I have great regard, estimates that perhaps 10,000,000 people will die of starvation even if we pass this bill, because we can not reach them. Millions more will starve if we refuse to pass this bill and nobody else takes up the burden that we refuse to place upon our own shoulders. Other people will take it up if we lay it down, but that will not meet our responsibility.

England and France, we are assured by Mr. Rickard, of the Food Administration, have done now in the relief of Belgium twice as much as the United States has done. We have done much. We are highly praised by the people for whom we have done it. We must not forfeit their good opinion by claiming that we have done it all. We must not boast of our generosity. There was work to be done in the world, and we undertook to do our share of it, so far as the knowledge of the necessities could be brought to our people. And the people were liberal. But we did not know the necessities as fully as the men and women of France and England knew them. They were passing under their eyes. We have not done as much as they have done, but I do believe if the necessity had continued, with the information that was being disseminated in this country and with our increasing understanding of the needs, that all we had would have been at the disposal of the allies and ourselves in this war if necessity had required.

Now, the great expenditures of the war have been passed. We have saved billions by the unexpected shortening of the period of hostilities. We ought not to throw our money away because we have saved what we did not expect to save. That is a spendthrift policy. When it is intended to spend money for one purpose and the expenditure is found to be unnecessary, the money should not burn a hole in our pocket merely because it is unspent. This is a characteristic of the spendthrift. But this expenditure is needed. We have the money. And to hold the place that our generosity and our very practical idealism have won for us in the world, we ought to continue to bear our share of the burden.

The purpose for which the money is needed is exceedingly well known. It is not to be spent in Germany. It is not a gift. It is not an appropriation of $100,000,000 to be given away. It is an appropriation to establish a revolving fund to be used in the purchase and distribution of food. That food is to be sold and paid for if the consumers are able to pay for it.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. I will.

Mr. GORDON. We have such a revolving fund now, and have had it for several years, under the administration of Mr. Hoover.

Mr. TEMPLE. Not for this purpose.

Mr. GORDON. Of course not. You can not give it away, but you can sell it. The purpose of this is solely to give it away, and it is the only purpose of it.

Mr. TEMPLE. The language of the bill provides:

That expenditures hereunder shall be reimbursed, so far as possible, by the Governments, or subdivisions thereof, or the peoples to whom relief is furnished.

Here is the language that describes the use to which the money may be put:

One hundred million dollars, which may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1919, and which shall be audited, where practicable, in the same manner as other expenditures of the Government.

Now, what are the other safeguards? In the first place, the main safeguard is that the funds shall be audited—and I intend to move an amendment to that—shall be audited, where practicable, in the same manner as other expenditures of the Government are audited. I would strike out the words "where practicable," and make it read:

Shall be audited in the same manner as other expenditures of the Government are audited.

I want that change to be made in the bill if possible. Another safeguard is that the expenditures made under this bill are to be reimbursed so far as possible by the Governments or subdivisions thereof, or the peoples to whom relief is furnished. In good faith, let us understand that. It says "reimbursed so far as possible." It can not be a revolving fund unless reimbursements are made. I imagine that the fund will diminish, that the amount that is revolving will decrease, but the President's telegram says the total shipments of foodstuffs will amount to one and one-half billion dollars, and the minimum sum to handle it is $100,000,000. Well, you can not make purchases and sales of $1,500,000,000 worth of food out of $100,000,000, or even $400,000,000, as it will be if Italy, England, and France contribute a like amount. The fund must be a revolving fund. The food purchased must be sold if it is to move that amount of food under the intention expressed here.

A further safeguard is found in the requirement of the last proviso of the bill:

Provided further, That a report of the receipts and expenditures under this appropriation shall be submitted to Congress not later than the first day of the next regular session.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. TEMPLE. For a short question.

Mr. DILLON. Does the gentleman understand that the famine-stricken people in this bill would include Armenians and Turks and Bulgars? We are not at war with those countries.

Mr. TEMPLE. The President's telegram says:

While the Secretary of the Treasury can accept obligations of certain Governments and through these measures their situations can be cared for temporarily, there are still other areas through eastern and southern Europe where such arrangements can not be made. This applies more particularly to the liberated peoples of Austria, Turkey, Poland, and western Russia.

Mr. DILLON. Does that apply to Bulgaria?

Mr. TEMPLE. So far as the language of the bill is concerned, there is nothing in it that would prevent the application to Bulgaria.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman think it ought to apply to Armenia?

Mr. TEMPLE. I certainly do. The only country that is specifically excepted is Germany.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. I have only two minutes, and I want to say something in those two minutes. The bill provides for relief outside of Germany. It was the plan, as appears in the hearings, to establish a food-supply depot at Rotterdam and out of the supply at that depot to sell food to Germany, provided Germany brought the gold in hand to pay for it. I would not object to that. But the language of the bill seems to throw Germany out altogether.

So far as Mr. Hoover is concerned, I have this to say: The work he undertook and did is of a magnitude that is almost beyond comprehension. The first food administrator that we know anything about in history or tradition had seven fat years in which to get ready for the seven lean years. Mr. Hoover had none. If sometimes he overstepped the strict letter of the law, it was because of the magnitude of the need, and that man will live honorably in the records of these times when many of us are forgotten. [Applause.]

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. TEMPLE. My time has expired, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. EMERSON. Does the gentleman say that the language in the first proviso makes it a revolving fund?

Mr. TEMPLE. Not the proviso, but the language preceding the proviso specifically says it shall be a revolving fund.

Mr. EMERSON. There is nothing mandatory about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has remaining 55 minutes and the gentleman from Kentucky 20 minutes and a half, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] 17 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], that there is much to be said in favor of as well as against this bill. I think gentlemen of the committee are capable at this time to determine in their own minds as to what their line of duty should be in regard to this contemplated appropriation. There are certain propositions that every gentleman should consider when he comes to make up his mind to vote for this bill. In the first place, in a general way we know the origin of this bill. We know that the able and distinguished and disinterested gentleman who had charge of our own food control during the war, Mr. Hoover, some time ago went over to Europe; he went over there for the purpose of determining in his own mind what should be done to relieve the distressed conditions that exist throughout Europe among the peoples that were without food and needed supplies. We do not know what the result of his deliberations has been. We do not know what his conclusions are. We do not know to-day whether or not he has formulated any plan, but out of a clear sky comes practically the demand of the President, saying to us, "Give me $100,000,000 to carry on the distribution of food in Europe."

What does that mean? I presume that it means that the $100,000,000 is to be handed over to Mr. Hoover, but I do not know it.

Are gentlemen ready to vote $100,000,000 without knowing to any extent in any manner by whom or to whom this fund is to be distributed? And yet that is what we are asked to do. We are asked to turn over this $100,000,000 presumably to Mr. Hoover—to do what? To organize, I presume, some kind of food relief for Europe. And yet the President tells us that this $100,000,000 is to be expended within the next six months. I presume it likely that this is to furnish the foundation upon which, until other nations can be brought into the arrangement, this distribution shall be made. We ought to know, if that be true, what these arrangements are.

I want to say to gentlemen in the House that the time has gone by when you can make these demands on the people of this country and have them approve of them without knowing what they are for. [Applause.] I want to say to the members of this committee that the people of this country will not sanction your action unless they know better than we do what it is for. I want to say to you that they will not sanction your action on the supposition that it is going to be well used, and that it will meet their approval. I do not know whether it will or not. I sincerely hope that it will meet with their approval. But that is no reason why we should be called upon to grant this enormous fund in a lump-sum appropriation without knowing how and where it is to be used.

Gentlemen say, "Oh, the necessity is great. Bolshevism is sweeping over Europe." I wonder if in any gentleman's mind he thinks that what we give here will stop the spread of Bolshevism. What is Bolshevism? It is composed of two classes—the soldiers who have been discharged and the workingmen who have no work. These have banded together upon a promise that they may divide the property of the earth among them and sustain themselves and govern themselves according to their own sweet will. Imagine those people being stopped by a loaf of bread! Gentlemen say that the Bolsheviki will be stopped only by "bread or bullets." Imagine that class of men being stopped by an offer of bread! They would spurn the offer and say, "We propose to take the bread, whether you give it or not." That is the spirit of Bolshevism.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I must not yield. I want to say, gentlemen, that you will not be justified before the people upon that assumption if you go to them with that reason for this appropriation. Neither will they hear you when you say you intended to stabilize the price of wheat. That is another afterthought intended for the purpose of forming some kind of an excuse to some gentlemen for voting for this bill. And yet at $2 a bushel this $100,000,000, if it were all spent for wheat, would buy only 50,000,000 bushels, and we are going to have a surplus for export and disposition of over 300,000,000 bushels. I wonder if that will stabilize the price of wheat.

No, gentlemen, these are not reasons; and I think if any gentleman goes before his people and says that at this time we took $100,000,000 out of the Treasury without knowing where it was to go, or by whom it was to be expended, or whether or not we were the only persons to distribute the fund or others were to share with us, he will go before them without sufficient excuse for his action.

Ah, gentlemen, the time has come when it will not do to say we did this because of extraordinary emergency to carry on this war. The people of this country will expect you to look upon every proposition for every appropriation with the utmost care and scrutiny. It will not be sufficient for you to say to them, "It was a good cause, it was a good proposition, it was a good appropriation." You must say to them in order to justify an appropriation now, at least of this enormous amount, that it was indispensably necessary. Why, what is the financial condition of this country now, gentlemen? You can not possibly figure out how you are going to get enough money during the next year to pay the appropriations that will be absolutely necessary.

Take your $6,000,000,000 that you are going to raise by taxation, and take your $6,000,000,000 that you hope to raise by a bond issue, and you have $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000 more yet to raise. Yet here you are spending $100,000,000 prematurely, without knowing where it is to go, without knowing what it is to be spent for, just as if you had the Treasury overflowing with money. Gentlemen, you will have to answer before your constituents for conduct of this kind. In my judgment there ought to be presented to us an arrangement by which we could justify such an appropriation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNER. If you will make it brief.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would not the gentleman consider it sufficient justification if this is part of the program and part of the ideal we said we were fighting for?

Mr. TOWNER. My dear sir, if you say that we are to become the great fountain from which all this money is to be drawn for the rehabilitation of Europe, neither your people nor my people will approve of that idea. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much interested in the discussion and especially in the tone and temper and in the substance of the speeches of those who have opposed the bill. I regret to say it, but it does seem to me that a large part of the opposition grows consciously or unconsciously out of a desire to discredit the President of the United States while he sits in the councils of the nations abroad. [Applause.] I know that heretofore opposition to measures under consideration has been accompanied, not once but many times, with denunciation of other actions of the President; on every opportunity they have iterated and reiterated general and special denunciation of him, and I know that excuses have been offered for opposition to this measure, by denunciation of Mr. Hoover, by denunciation of a certain corporation, and by all manner of excuses. It seems to me that the whole course of the Republicans is calculated and intended in this country and possibly abroad to cast a stain, a stigma, and a shame upon our representatives at the council table abroad. I want to tell you, gentlemen, that if you vote against this bill to-day you will live to see the day when your children will be ashamed of your vote. You may hope to shame the President but you will only shame your children by your speeches. [Applause.]

Before the last election these men who are denouncing the President now were the loudest in their declarations that they had loyally and devotedly supported the President in all his war policies, and that their party was even more loyal in their support of him than were the Democrats, and by their speeches and newspaper propaganda they convinced hundreds of thousands of voters, who honestly supported the President and believed in him as the wisest and strongest leader of the Nation, that these declarations were true. The voters did not analyze correctly the record of these Republicans. Had they done so, their votes would have been different. They would have discovered that even during the war they voted with the President on questions whenever overwhelming public sentiment drove them to support him, and that they obstructed and opposed every measure which it was safe to oppose or obstruct. They opposed and obstructed nearly all the measures to raise revenue; they opposed and obstructed the bill to create the Shipping Board and authorize the construction and operation of ships; the bill to create an armor-plate plant; a substantial majority of them favored the McLemore resolution and made a bitter fight to prevent its consideration by opposing the rule to consider it; and on these and many other measures they made hundreds of speeches bitterly criticizing the President. But when it came to appropriations for the Army and Navy they voted with the President. They would have been execrated if they had not, and they knew it, and on these latter votes they appealed to the country as supporters of the President. The President knew them and knew what kind of followers they were; but even he could hardly have dreamed that, after securing their election by professions of loyalty to him, they would turn around and declare that their election was a repudiation of him, as they began to do the day after the election and have continued to do ever since.

Before the election they were followers of the President, but under their cloaks of devoted followers they carried stilettos, ready to stab him in the back as soon as they could do it safely.

The President understood what kind of followers they were when he asked the American people to elect a Democratic majority; but they had so far convinced the people of their honesty and zeal in his support that many voters actually resented his request. The election is over; the Republicans are elected; their cloaks have fallen off and the stilettos they have always carried are no longer concealed. They stab the President openly and boastfully, and they hope and believe that by the next election they can so discredit and wound him that he will be shorn of his strength with the people. Every error, every mistake of omission or commission, every extravagance, every failure, either here or in France, is directly or indirectly laid at his individual door. We have heard it done in this debate to-day; we have heard it before and will hear it until November, 1920. And at every step the President takes he will be dogged and badgered by these men so loyal and devoted only a few months ago. The fight on this bill is only an illustration. It was submitted to the Committee on Appropriations; it was reported out against the almost solid opposition of the Republican membership of that committee. Speed in its passage was urgently needed, but the Republicans in the House objected to its consideration; a rule for its consideration had to be had; the Republicans on the Rules Committee opposed and at first, by absence of Democratic Members, defeated the rule in the committee. The full committee was gotten after several days' delay, and then the rule was reported out against the solid opposition of the Republicans and with the solid support of the Democrats, and so, Mr. Speaker, this measure, that tugs at the heartstrings of every man who has a soul, is made a party measure because the President asked for its passage. At first the Republican leaders, with a few conspicuous exceptions, seemed to fall over each other in order to get to oppose it, but as the debate proceeds they are weakening.

One gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] declared that while he was opposing the bill he would vote for it if an amendment making the Red Cross, an unofficial body, the agent to expend the money were adopted. Does his charity wait and hang on his spleen against the President? Or is it simply that he wants to make good the Republican statement that the last election was a repudiation of the President? Or does he want to show Europe that he has no faith in our President, in whose hands the bill places the fund? Or, having opposed the bill, has he become ashamed, and is he seeking a loophole by which he may claim to support the purpose of the bill and yet assault the President? Or is he simply seeking to frame an excuse for his vote against the measure, which he will finally cast?

What is this proposition? It is a proposition on which our allies—England, France, and Italy—have already expressed their purpose, and they are even now extending their assistance to the starving nations of Europe; and our President, sitting in council with them, doubtless agreed with them and said what he thought the American Government would do. If he had listened to the quibbles of the gentlemen here, he would have stood with his finger in his mouth and said, "I do not know whether America will help or not," and you gentlemen would have been ashamed of your country and ashamed of your President if he had done so, and you know it. [Applause.]

A similar bill to this came before Congress when Mr. Roosevelt was President. A volcano or earthquake destroyed a part of Italy and your President asked for an appropriation of $800,000 to relieve the stricken district. Every motive and purpose for the passage of this bill and every motive and purpose for opposition to it existed as to that bill when you gentlemen were in power and your President asked for help to relieve the suffering in Italy. You gave it to him without a whimper or a quibble, and you were right. The sum asked then was less than one-hundredth part of what is asked now, but the occasion was not one-hundredth part as great.

The man who stands here and opposes this measure necessarily hunts for an excuse. Every man who has expressed his opposition to this bill has hunted an excuse. He hides behind the Constitution, criticism of the President, criticism of Mr. Hoover, criticism of a certain corporation, behind anything he can conjure up, and he will be hunting for excuses as long as he stays in public life. [Applause.] Some gentlemen say, "We do not know; we have not been sufficiently informed as to the need of this." The gentlemen who last spoke and some others have said, "We object to bulk appropriations." What intelligent man is there who does not know the fearful and pressing need of the starving millions of Europe, and how in the name of God would you itemize an appropriation here to be given to the different nations—little Serbia, Albania, Roumania, Montenegro, parts of Italy, perhaps, or Poland? How are you going to itemize them?

Then some say, "We do not know who will expend this." Others say, "We do know who will expend it and we object because Mr. Hoover is going to have something to do with it." It is a congeries of excuses; but the real purpose seems to me to be to slap the President in the face while he sits at the council table. Well, gentlemen, that is one blow you will live to regret if you succeed in giving it. One gentleman, Mr. SLOAN, of Nebraska, declared, "It seems to me that we should begin to think of America and legislate for America. If there is any charitable credit to be drawn from the Treasury let us save it for Americans." If I had made that speech I would hide the RECORD containing it from my children.

The Good Book gives us a story told by the Master: "And Jesus answering [the lawyer] said: A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead. And by chance there came down a certain priest that way, and when he saw him he passed by on the other side. And likewise a Levite, when he was at that place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side. But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was, and when he saw him he had compassion on him, and went to him, bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. And on the morrow when he departed he took out twopence and gave them to his host, and said unto him, 'Take care of him, and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again I will repay thee.' Which, now, of these three thinkest thou was neighbor unto him that fell among the thieves?"

Benedict Arnold has had ingenious apologists for his treason; Judas Iscariot has had excuses made for his betrayal; but in all the centuries that have passed no man has attempted to defend or excuse the priest and the Levite who passed by on the other side.

Among the great nations assembled at the peace-council table are England, France, and America. We were eleventh-hour servants in the vineyard, in the fighting of the war. Shall we take a small part or no part in the healing of the nations? We were ready to spend $30,000,000,000 to fight our way to victory, but now some gentlemen are not willing to spend one three-hundredth part of that amount to heal the wounds which were left in the wake of the war.

But, Mr. Chairman, the story of the priest and the Levite and the good Samaritan, or the appeal of stricken Italy in former times, is not all that is involved in this measure. If we and England and France and Italy were governed by the selfishness of some of the gentlemen who have spoken against this bill we might not save our treasure. Should all of us pass by on the other side and leave the starving, shivering millions of desolate Europe to die, they might in dying and in revolt against inhumanity inaugurate a reign of terror that would destroy all hope of peace and require a million or two million of the allied troops, our boys among the rest, to fight another war for the safety of civilization and to conquer peace again. The bloody French Revolution might pale before the monstrous upheaval of the beast that lurks in the hunger and despair of hundreds of millions of people. And we might spend not a hundred million dollars, but ten billions of dollars and thousands upon thousands of young men's lives, young men whose faces are now turning toward the west, whose eyes are gleaming with the hope of seeing soon their homes and loved ones. The great lesson of the war may yet be that love triumphs where armies fail; that the good Samaritan is at last the conqueror of the world; and this bill may be the beginning of the regeneration of civilization, the healing of the nations. It ought to pass without a dissenting vote. [Applause.]

ADDENDUM.

On the motion to recommit the bill and amend it so that the fund would be taken out of the President's hands and placed in the hands of the Red Cross there were—yeas, 1 Democrat and 116 Republicans; nays, 167 Democrats, 34 Republicans. On final passage of the bill there were—yeas, 154 Democrats, 87 Republicans; nays, 9 Democrats, 64 Republicans.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, there is no man in the American Congress, in either House I fancy, who takes a more kindly interest in the efforts of the President to bring about conditions in Europe that will not only make for peace, but for permanent peace, than I do. For years I have been an advocate in every substantial way of the program for a permanent peace which is now proposed by the President. Of course, I wish him Godspeed in his efforts to build up an organization throughout the world that will help to lift the burdens from off the shoulders of the people, by lessening armament everywhere, and for securing permanent peace. I welcome the overthrow of the autocracies in Russia and Germany as a step toward that permanent peace, because I believe the people will never assess against themselves, if they have control, the penalty of suicide.

But, Mr. Chairman, I recognize that the greatest menace now threatening civilization in the whole wide world is anarchy, sometimes called Bolshevism. Bolshevism and anarchy exist in Russia through an enormous area. It is rapidly spreading over the whole German Empire. If we are going to appease hunger that makes people restless and inclines them to anarchy, why should we overlook what is perhaps the greatest point of danger in all Europe to-day? Surely, hunger affects the German people, as it affects those in Russia and Serbia, Asia Minor, and other parts of the world. There is no exclusion of Turkey in this bill as far as I can see, the people of the Ottoman Empire, and if we are to exclude the German people, the most of whom had nothing to do with making the war, and who are among its greatest victims, except the devastated areas in France and Belgium—if we are to exclude them, do we tend to allay their unrest, do we tend to reconcile them to the control of the leading associated governments? Do we tend to help bring them into the league of peace, as ultimately they must come, if that league is worth having, by saying that we will prevent anarchy in Russia, we will cure anarchy in all other parts of the world, but we will let you starve and thereby promote anarchy in your section of the country?

To my mind that is the only good reason for the passage of the bill, but I think I see some reasons why it should not pass. Being old-fashioned, I am accustomed to act in accordance with a document that I swore to uphold and defend. I can find no authority in the Constitution for the contribution of $100,000,000 for charity anywhere. The President says in his cable:

I wish to appeal to the great sense of charity and good will of the American people toward the suffering, and to place that act primarily on a humanitarian basis.

Now, if the President had said that in his scheme to bring peace to the whole world it appeared essential, in his judgment as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, to facilitate the progress of universal peace, that we should do this thing, that we should help the governments and the peoples who are not in a position to help themselves, it would have been, in my opinion, a stronger appeal and with greater justification for the votes we are asked to give. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Does the gentleman remember in the Fifty-ninth Congress, when President Roosevelt requested an appropriation for Italy?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I was not in Washington at that time.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to discuss this question or impose myself on the House. But we have been so frequently lectured by certain gentlemen self-imposed censors in this House that while intending to vote against this measure, I now desire to make a few observations.

I assume that every man on this floor who proposes to vote for this measure is absolutely honest. I assume that he is absolutely patriotic. I challenge his right, however, to even suggest that anyone who opposes it has less than he of either one of these qualities. I specially resent the lecture which we received from the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] about the lack of patriotism of those who oppose this bill. When men on this floor have made sacrifices that he did not and could not make, he has no right, living in the time that he is and of the age that he is, to stand here and criticize any man as to any vote on any war procedure.

No man, unless he has taken the risk to sacrifice himself in this war, having an opportunity to do so, or through those of his own blood, has the right to question the patriotism of any man who stands here and votes as he believes patriotic and right. [Applause.]

The day has been when a man could stand here and say if you do not vote thus and so the public will deem you disloyal, and you know that the loudest mouthed of all those men have been the men who made the least sacrifices during the war. [Applause.] A specious plea has been made here to-day. It has been made too often in the last 21 months—that you must stand by your Government, and then explain that the Government means the President of the United States. That would be true in Russia, and it may be true in the minds of some men living in this country with their hearts over yonder, but it is not true generally in America, and I hope it never will be. The President of the United States is not the Government, and the Capital of the United States is still in Washington and not yet in Versailles or Paris.

Many of us are becoming aweary of discussions concerning the league of nations. There are many nations, and if some would influence or control others, there must be some kind of combination of nations. But up to this time, as each eye sees a different rainbow so all men have their different visions of a league of nations for peace. Whatever the official conception of the league may be, there is only one who knows, and he refuses to tell, except, perhaps, into the ear of royalty.

It seems to me that we should begin to think of America and legislate for America. If there is any charitable credit to be drawn from our Treasury let us save it for Americans. Extend this charity from the Treasury in favor of those to whom we owe no obligation, and what answer will you make to the pleas which common foresight must see rising from every quarter of the United States?

Has the atmosphere of France prompted those who should be most solicitous for our Treasury's stability to subscribe to the easy philosophy spoken over there a century and a half ago by Mme. Pompadour when she comforted that fatuous French monarch with the statement, "After us, the deluge"?

It would seem that if our quondam President had not been so obsessed with the delusion of his own indispensability and burdened with the authorship and advocacy of the 14 points of ambiguity, now largely scrapped, and had appointed three great Democrats and two great Republicans to have met the leading statesmen of Europe at the peace table there would have been no S O S sent hither for a golden crutch to support a prestige which his friends deem in danger.

The reasons urged for this bill are, first, that we are practically pledged to it by one Hoover, toward whom it is said that no finger has been pointed. I point no finger at him, but as long as they have specially mentioned Hoover, permit me to say that a great many of the producers of this country will remember him for many years to come as one who thought of the American producer last, if at all. He thought of the foreign consumer and made the standard of cattle the Argentine product instead of the product of our own country. Out of this grew the bankruptcy of a large number of people throughout the Northwest. Mr. Hoover has no authority from the Congress of the United States to make a pledge of a single dollar to be paid under any circumstances out of the Treasury of the United States. "Upon what meat doth this, our Hoover, feed, that he has grown so great" that he can without authority of Congress pledge the credit of the United States? What right has our chief commissioner over there to pledge the credit of the United States? Men differ with regard to this, but I regard him only as chief peace commissioner over there, and nothing more. I do not regard him as the President of the United States at this time. He is there as a commissioner, or in no capacity whatever. A peace commissioner has no authority over us, the custodians of the coin, the currency, and the credit of the United States, or jurisdiction to pledge $100,000,000 for any charity.

A picturesque character in another forum said that our Chief Commissioner was over there as Commander in Chief of our armies. "Angels and ministers of grace defend us" all from such a defense. He would have the Commander in Chief remain 4,000 miles away, with stormy seas between, while the "battle of the ages" raged along the deadliest line of the centuries until the fighting ceased and then with hysteric haste hurry to the zone of former conflict. As no one on that side has seen fit to defend against that defense, permit me in this way to break a lance in his behalf.

It is said that it would embarrass our quandom President, now acting as chief peace commissioner over yonder should we not give him this $100,000,000. Was it not thought of by him that it might be embarrassing for some of his friends to vote their convictions and against this raid on the National Treasury? If he would reach for this money in the Treasury of the United States, why did he not consult with the Congress before this round-robin message was sent? It did not come from the President of the United States constitutionally. It could not come from the President of the United States while he is over there. If it had come from the President of the United States, it would have come in person or through a message to the Congress of the United States and not to the Secretary of the Treasury, unless he saw fit to show fine scorn for this body.

Is $100,000,000 a bauble—such a paltry sum that it is not worth mentioning to the Congress of the United States, the lawful guardians of the Treasury? One hundred million dollars is almost the precise sum the collection or noncollection of which at the ports of the United States turned the control of the country from the Republican side of the House to the Democrats. I fear this absent treatment being administered to the Republic is going to be very expensive. Now, how lightly they say he asks for this $100,000,000 in order to keep his prestige at high-water mark! What prestige can a commissioner for peace have or lose that he could purchase back by $100,000,000? Philip of Macedon said that the golden key could open the gate of any city, but I do not understand that we are sufficiently interested in the portals of Europe to use the golden key on any of their cities, or any of their countries. Here Congress is expected to yield, as it has too often in the last six years under implied threat that in case Congress stood by its convictions some dire calamity would occur. We remember well a national campaign was conducted on a certain issue, and when it was won we were asked to grant an ungrudging reversal of that issue on account of matters of nearer and greater consequence. Years have elapsed, but what these consequences were no man knows any more than he does the unrevealed secrets of Sahara's silent Sphinx.

We are asked for $100,000,000, and men who oppose it want to know when it is to be given, to whom it is to be given, how it is to be safeguarded, to whom it is to be paid, and no answer is given. They practically say you heard our demand, yield. Your oaths and your country's good are both entirely irrelevant.

We should not grant the $100,000,000 to dazzle the real powers of Europe, which are Britain, France, and Italy. There has been enough of splendor since that composite company seized the American transport named for the father of our country and after converting it into a floating palace of glass, walled within with costly wood and precious metal, furnished it with all the trappings to delight the vision and invite supercomfort of those on board. There was a commissary that would tickle palate, appease appetite, and assuage thirst. It sailed away with many men of many minds, including statesmen, diplomats, scribes, healers, chefs, necromancers, valets, vocalists, and those who performed cunningly on flute and harp. The burdened cables and the surcharged upper ether brought multiplied messages of the glory and splendor of their Brittanny landing. The princely, yea, imperial, meeting at gay Paris or historic Versailles sent every volatile Frenchman in thought back 400 years ago to the regal meeting of the English and French sovereigns on the "Field of the Cloth of Gold." It has been a source of gratification to some inhabitants of the United States that the splendor and glory of the "Field of the Cloth of Gold" had dimmed before the blaze of the twentieth century's resplendent magnificence. There are those, too, who see in this proceeding how the mysterious Mr. House had in making arrangements far outclassed Cardinal Wolsey, who had brought together the vain King Francis I and the autocratic Henry VIII. History says of that famous meeting, "It attracted much attention, but little was achieved." History has a way of repeating itself.

Why longer delay for further display? Have they not dined at Buckingham Palace where unaccustomed guests wear smoked glasses that the splendor injure not their vision?

Have they not reposed in the palace of the Quirinal over against the Capitoline, where once slumbered the rulers of Imperial Rome? Have they not visited the Vatican? Yea, more, do they not lodge in the palace of Murat, the lord of which traces his lineage to the family of the great Corsican?

It might, but it should not, be a fitting finish to distribute imperial largesses from our National Treasury unto the professional poor of Europe. We have been generous even unto profligacy in our loans. We have given from the pockets of our people vast sums through the Red Cross, Young Men's Christian Association, Knights of Columbus, and similar organizations to alleviate the want and suffering of Europe. That is proper. But the Treasury of the United States is not an eleemosynary institution. It should not be used as such. We read in the dispatches about many small nations being formed in Europe whether the large nations of that continent favor them or not. I am opposed to calling into existence further small nations if American blood must defend them or the American Treasury sustain them.

Bolshevism is rampant in Europe. Already the allies are disclaiming responsibility for the overthrow of the government upon which it has raised its crimson flag. They impliedly call attention to America's responsibility. We should not feed Bolshevism in Europe. We may need our food and energy to resist and maybe fight it in America.

Note the following recent dispatch:

OUR JOB TO CRUSH REDS, PAPER SAYS.

LONDON, January 12.

In an editorial to-day, advocating suppression of the Bolsheviki, the Globe declared it is "Uncle Sam's job."

"We appeal to President Wilson and America to consider the Russian situation and ask themselves whether they haven't serious responsibilities in that regard," said the Globe.

"President Wilson knows it is useless for his high ideals to be realized while Russia is a welter of madness and bloodshed. Doesn't President Wilson think that suppression of the Bolsheviki is Uncle Sam's job? Somebody must do it. We and the French are in no condition for such an undertaking."

This money is not needed in peace negotiations. Six weeks have elapsed since the George Washington lifted anchor, and the diplomatic gladiators are still sparring for an opening. If it be not lese majesty or contempt of court, let me suggest as a means of settlement that they "proceed to settle." Paraphrasing Horace Greeley's famous statement, "The way to settle is to settle."

This debate is nearly closed and we are still about as short of information as Mark Twain was in his day. Mark Twain had a son christened William, but called Willy. He, too, was over in Europe. He, too, was in the atmosphere of nobility. He, too, basked in the blaze of near royalty. On the morning after he, too, looked about and saw that there were poor in Europe, and so he cabled for a thousand dollars. Mark Twain, like some of us, wanted to know and cabled back "What for," and he answered that it was "for Willy." Now, this is "for Woodrow," with about as much information as Willy had vouchsafed Mark. I am opposed to giving $100,000,000 to keep Woodrow in the king row.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to have about two minutes more.

Mr. GILLETT. I am very sorry, but all my time has been promised.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to finish that cablegram. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. I have promised every minute that I have got.

By unanimous consent Mr. SLOAN was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

By unanimous consent, leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD was granted to Mr. GORDON, Mr. GILLETT, and Mr. SLAYDEN.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Chairman, the cablegram of the President contains a most extraordinary request. We are informed that the appropriation asked for is necessary to prevent people living in areas devastated by war from starving to death. If we read between the lines we can reasonably conclude that, in the opinion of the President, food and supplies in the areas referred to will bring order out of chaos and result in the creation of some sort of government in the place of anarchy. Viewed in this aspect, the bill can well be regarded as a war measure.

We must bear in mind that the war is not yet ended. If humanitarian acts will tend to prevent further devastation of war and hasten the time when our soldiers can safely be ordered from overseas to America, then our duty in the premises is clear. [Applause.]

It is apparent that whatever is to be done must be promptly done. We can not dally in the face of starvation and anarchy. The President is on the ground; he is Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy of the United States; he has urged upon us the necessity of prompt action, and in the absence of information which he must be presumed to possess I can not bring myself, through partisan or other motives, to the point of denying his request. [Applause.]

The expenditure of $100,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, now might result in the saving not only of billions of dollars, but also of many precious American lives. The President has not seen fit to consult with us before making his request, but the request is before the world, and it seems to me that in time of war we are bound to sustain the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAGEE. I regret I have not any time to yield.

It is immaterial whether we deemed it wise or unwise for the President to go overseas; it is unavailing whether we agree or disagree with his views in the making of the treaty of peace; and it is irrelevant to our determination as legislators whom he shall designate to carry out his orders in the distribution and application of the funds provided.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman say he would yield?

Mr. MAGEE. I must respectfully decline to yield; I have not the time.

The fact remains that he has gone overseas, and we should wish him success and a Godspeed in his great mission. The fact exists that he has strong convictions upon the kind of a treaty of peace that will best guarantee the future peace of the world, and it is apparent that the responsibility for the distribution of any appropriation made by the Congress must rest upon him. [Applause.]

One other thing is apparent and absolutely controlling: We must not discredit the President of the United States before the world on the eve of the peace conference, which will be the most momentous gathering in all history [applause], and probably shape the destinies of the peoples upon this earth for generations to come. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the argument of my friend from New York who has just spoken is, to say the least, very discouraging, because if what he says is true we need not expect these large, unprecedented appropriations to cease until domestic peace has been restored in all the countries of the world. Now, I say that is very discouraging. This bill affords a splendid illustration of the different way that arguments appeal to the minds of different Members. Now, one argument advanced in favor of this bill here to-day is that there is a large amount of food, particularly meats, that have been accumulated at high prices by the packers and by others in this country and that this appropriation will afford a ready market for that accumulated food. Now, gentlemen of the House, that is one of the reasons why I am against the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. No; I have not the time; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DENISON. I will never vote for an appropriation from the Public Treasury in order to supply an easy market for the foodstuffs that may have accumulated at war prices in the hands of the packers or anyone else in this country.

Another argument that has been advanced by advocates of this measure, particularly the chairman of the committee, is that this money will be expended largely in this country. Now, that is another reason why I am opposed to the bill; that is, I am not willing to vote appropriations out of the Treasury to be given away to the people of other countries, simply because the money will be spent for the foodstuffs that are produced in this country.

Another argument advanced in favor of the bill is that it will tend to stop Bolshevism. Now, gentlemen of the House, I do not know any place where Bolshevism is doing so much damage as it is doing in Germany to-day, and yet we are not going to spend any of this money, they say, in Germany. The chairman of the committee [Mr. SHERLEY], I believe, said that none of this money is to be given away in Germany, because Germany has plenty of money to feed her own people; and yet if that argument in favor of this bill is sound, there ought not to be any Bolshevism in Germany, because he says they have plenty of money in Germany to feed their people. That argument that this appropriation will help stop the spread of Bolshevism does not appeal to me at all. But the main argument, as I understand it, that has been advanced in favor of this bill is the one stated by the President in his cablegram—that we ought to make this appropriation for charitable and humanitarian reasons. Now, gentlemen of the House, that is another reason why I am against the bill. I do not think it is my duty, nor do I have the right, as a Member of the House, to vote appropriations out of the Public Treasury for charitable or humanitarian disbursement in foreign countries. I think that appeals for funds for humanitarian purposes should be addressed to the people of the country and not to their Representatives in Congress. During some of the recent Red Cross campaigns I had occasion to speak and appeal to the people of my district to contribute to the Red Cross and to the Y. M. C. A. and other war-work agencies. We wanted those funds to help take care of our suffering and dying soldiers who were fighting our battles for us. I was asked by a number of people why Congress did not appropriate money for the Red Cross and for the Y. M. C. A. Surely those were commendable causes and it seems to me, at least, it is just as commendable and as urgent that we give our money to administer to our own suffering and dying soldiers as it is for us to give money to feed the people of foreign lands. I had to answer that it was not the policy of the Government or the part of wisdom to appropriate money out of the Public Treasury for such purposes. Those are purposes of mercy and of charity, and we must depend upon those impulses in the people themselves to give, as far as they are able to give, for that kind of relief. If the President had appealed to the people to contribute this money to help feed the starving peoples of Europe, I would have been glad to have helped to raise it in every way I could; but I am opposed to making an appropriation out of the Public Treasury for that purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the time has come when I am unwilling to vote large lump-sum appropriations upon the mere request of the President or any other person. While we were at war, and it was necessary to devote all our resources to the prosecution of the war, I was willing to give the President such powers as he thought were necessary to enable him to successfully prosecute the war. But now we are no longer threatened by a common enemy, and the chief purpose of our entering into the war has been accomplished, and before I vote for any more hundred million dollar appropriations from the Public Treasury I have got to know that it is for a purpose for which we have a legitimate right under the Constitution to tax the people; and I have got to be shown who is going to expend the money and how it is going to be expended. After the German Army had ruthlessly marched over Belgium and France, destroying the homes of the people, devastating the country, and leaving the people dying from exposure and starvation, did the President call upon Congress for an appropriation from the Public Treasury to help relieve those people? No. He called upon the people for voluntary contributions for that purpose, and the money was freely given. When Austrian and Bulgarian Armies marched over Serbia, driving the Serbian Army out of their own country and completely devastating Serbia and leaving the people of that country starving and dying, did the President ask Congress to appropriate money from the Public Treasury in order to relieve them? No. But now, when the fighting is over and the President goes to Europe for the purpose of impressing upon the representatives of the countries over there the necessity of incorporating into the treaty of peace certain ideas of his own as to a league of nations and other plans which he thinks will insure an eternal peace on earth among men, he cables back that he wants $100,000,000 out of the Public Treasury to help feed the people of those countries. I do not think we have enough information upon which to make an appropriation of this kind. I think the President should have taken Congress more into his confidence and disclosed to us more of his plans and purposes. If the people of Europe are starving, I think the people of this country should contribute freely for their relief, but I think such contribution should be entirely voluntary. I do not think that we should tax the people of this country for all these many millions in order to distribute charity to the peoples of Europe. If the President had been willing to send a message back to the American people telling them of the conditions in Europe, and had asked the people to contribute at once for the relief of the suffering over there, I am sure many Members of the House would have been willing, as I would have been, to turn to our districts and appeal to the people to contribute of their means for that purpose; but I do not think that we, as representatives of the people, without any authority from those we represent, have any right to levy taxes upon the people to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars to be given away by the President in Europe, however charitable and merciful his purposes may be.

We have been appropriating money in staggering amounts for the prosecution of this war, and we have of necessity got to continue doing so in order to meet the legitimate obligations that will fall upon the Government as a result of the war. The time is coming when the people are going to demand an accounting and we will have to explain by what right we made these vast appropriations of the people's money. It will only be a short time until there will be another Government-bond campaign, and all over this country the people will be begged to loan the Government money. More funds will have to be raised for the Red Cross, and we will have to appeal to the people for voluntary contributions for various purposes growing out of this war. I think we should hesitate before we appropriate money out of the Treasury in order to stop the spread of Bolshevism in Europe. We have no assurance and no facts upon which to even base an opinion that the expenditure of $100,000,000 to help feed the peoples of Europe will have any effect whatever upon the spread of Bolshevism.

I am unwilling to vote for this appropriation, because I think it establishes a dangerous precedent. It will only be a short time, I fear, until other appeals will be made for similar appropriations, because if the President is going to undertake to help feed the world in order to prevent revolution, civil war, or other disorders in foreign lands, we will have to be making appropriations a long time, and it will only be a short time until these appropriations will amount to many hundreds of millions. And where will we stop? The time to stop such appropriations is before we begin them. I think that we should confine our appropriations of the public funds to those purposes which are the legitimate and necessary functions of the Government, and that the money we spend to feed the starving peoples of Europe or for other charitable or humanitarian purposes should be raised by voluntary subscriptions of the people.

For months I have appealed, as I am sure many Members have, to the War Department and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to pay to the families of our soldiers the allotments and allowances that are due them. And yet these payments have not been made and the families of those who are fighting for this country have been positively suffering in many instances because this Government has not met its obligations to its own people. Even our soldiers themselves have not been paid. I wish that more attention could be paid to the obligations that the country owes its own soldiers and the families of the soldiers and to those who are suffering for want of food here before we begin distributing money from the Public Treasury to the peoples of Europe. We can not afford, of course, to see people die of starvation anywhere if we can prevent it. But in the absence of more information than we now have, I am unwilling to appropriate public money for that purpose now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois use some of his time?

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] seven minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Gentlemen, the voting of this authorization is to enable the administration to treat all peoples who have engaged in the great European war on a parity with one another, except the people of Germany. For my part, I would like to see that exception eliminated, because it has been stated time and time again from the very beginning of the war that we were not warring against the peoples of Germany but against the governing class. The hearings disclose the intention not to except Germany, but to allow foodstuffs to be sold to Germany for cash.

Under existing law, in the act passed within less than a month after we declared war, authority was vested in the administration to advance to the credit of foreign governments engaged in the war against the central powers the moneys of this Government to the extent of billions of dollars. At the present time the Treasury is advancing moneys to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars to all those governments—to Great Britain, to France, to Italy, to Belgium, to Serbia, to Greece, and to the Czecho-Slovak nation—for the rehabilitation of those countries and for the purchase of foodstuffs and supplies. And yet it can not, because of the phraseology of the law, advance credit and funds to the Jugo-Slavs or the Polish people. Having invited those people to assist us in the war in overthrowing Germany to the extent of sacrificing their lifeblood, are we to refuse them, just because they have no form of government now in existence, the succor we are extending to other peoples? Is it to be said that we are going to have one policy toward one people and a different policy as to another people?

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Just for a short question.

Mr. SLOAN. Does not the gentleman know that we are loaning money to the Czecho-Slovak government now?

Mr. STAFFORD. I stated that, because that is one of the recognized governments; but we are not loaning money to the Jugo-Slovaks, nor are we able under that law to advance money to the Poles. Those people were just as instrumental in overthrowing the autocratic Government of Germany as the established governments and allied powers were.

Gentlemen in opposing this proposition would restrict, would hamper, the President in his efforts to settle this great world problem. Why, I have seen the Congress vote millions of dollars without authority, as, for instance, for the relief of the people of Salem, Mass., for a little conflagration, and the entire Massachusetts delegation voted solidly for that unconstitutional appropriation. [Applause.] And in times of peace we have voted hundreds of thousands of dollars when some earthquake devastated certain portions of the outside world without constitutional authority. But here, with war still existing technically, when we have the full right and authority to aid the President, and to allow him to expend this money, objection is raised. Who knows but what at the peace table the President and the allied powers might not exact from our enemy, Germany, the return of this $100,000,000, or so much money as may be advanced to these unconstituted authorities as is necessary for the rehabilitation of those countries, and, what is more necessary, to prevent starvation from stalking everywhere in those countries.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. GORDON. If it is unconstitutional to give money to your own citizens, why is it not unconstitutional to give it to nonresident aliens?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because we are still at war. Only an armistice has been declared, and it is in the power of the President, as one of the terms of peace to exact from Germany, our enemy, the return of the money that this Government and the allied governments will advance to these people.

Criticism has been lodged against this measure in that it should not be done by the Government, but by the Red Cross. We recognized the policy of advancing this money through the Government in the very first bond act, in making loans and advancing money to the powers that exist. Shall it be said that just because the governments do not exist, whereby we can deal directly with them as a constituted entity, that we should be deprived of making these advances?

In the bill that is about to be presented for consideration following this measure, the legislative appropriation bill, hundreds of thousands of dollars are to be voted to the Department of Commerce to advance our commerce in the way of rehabilitating these stricken countries that have been engaged in this war. There can be no better business proposition, looking at it from the standpoint of American business policy, than for us to vote this $100,000,000 to alleviate the suffering conditions in those countries. Shall it be said that we were strong for making profits from the sale of munitions, but unwilling to lend a helping hand to aid the distressed in the impoverished countries devastated by the war?

I remember attending a lecture given by Mr. Rockwell, a representative of the Rockefeller Foundation, after the devastating drive Germany made across Poland, in which he depicted the terrible conditions existing all through Poland, and request was made that Congress should aid——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to give me all the time he can spare.

Mr. CANNON. I have three minutes remaining, which I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. And request was made that Congress should aid in relieving and alleviating those conditions by appropriating $500,000,000, and a like amount to be raised by private subscription. We did not feel it incumbent upon us at that time, because we were not in the war, but there are some men here who were strongly in favor of getting into the war but who do not wish now to recognize the obligations that come as the result of the war. You can not shirk these responsibilities even if you would.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is a disposition among some Members of this Chamber and there is a disposition throughout the country that, now that the armistice has been signed, we should separate ourselves absolutely from the conditions growing out of the war. I, too, wish to extricate our Government from European imbroglios, but there are certain obligations thrust upon us that follow as a corollary to our entrance in the war. One of the obligations imposed on the United States as a result of the war is to take care of the people who aided in the victory that came so suddenly, to prevent them from starving until they can return to peaceful pursuits.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. In a moment. Shall we say to the Jugo-Slavic people and to the Poles, who were patriotic to the core in helping to overthrow Germany, that just because there is no government in existence of the Jugo-Slavs or in Poland whereby we could advance money to them on bonds and give them credit, we shall allow starvation to spread, and permit utter ruin, chaos, and anarchy to follow? I believe the American people, after we have withdrawn billions of expenditures from foreign Governments for furnishing bullets and munitions against warring people, will at least be willing to give $100,000,000 of our ample stores to try to rehabilitate those people by giving them bread instead of bullets.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I wanted to ask if the gentleman had voted for the declaration of war?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, everybody in this Chamber knows that I did not. That is merely a flippant interjection on the part of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Oh, no; the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to yield for such flippant remarks. That is beside the question under discussion. Every vote of mine since the declaration of war has been to the end of carrying that war to a successful conclusion. Now that the armistice has been signed, I am not willing to hamper the President, under the guise of economy, to bring about conditions in stricken Europe, so that he can not negotiate the proper terms for an enduring peace. I am that kind of a patriot, and not a partisan war advocate. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois yields five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio from the allotment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, if I am given an opportunity I will offer an amendment to this bill which, I believe, will provide a safeguard in the distribution of this fund which will be fair and which is as little as we, the representatives of the people, should do.

The bringing of this bill before the House presents a most serious problem to every conscientious Member. I do not believe that the time has come when this country can refuse to respond to the pleas of outcrying and suffering humanity, no matter where they may be. I do not believe that the time has come—and I trust that it may never come—when the conditions of our Treasury will be such as to make it impossible for us to aid the suffering because we can not afford to be charitable. This is a great, resourceful, and powerful Nation, and we can afford to do our part, be it great or small, toward every humanitarian project.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Following that out, I think it will follow as a consequence that, having made this appropriation, some future Congress will be called upon to appropriate great funds to stop the formation of bread lines in the United States.

Mr. McCULLOCH. That may be necessary some day, yet I hope not. But the time has come when it is the duty of this House to scrutinize not only all bills appropriating money but all pleas for money of every kind that may be made. There is a limit to which the people will justify extravagant expenditures. Under the Constitution the power is lodged with Congress to raise money by placing upon the people the burdens of taxation. Under the provisions of that same Constitution Congress has the power to disburse by appropriations the money so raised among the various departments for governmental purposes or otherwise. The granting and the accepting of such powers carry corresponding responsibilities. Under the stress of war the Members of this House have let down the bars and have granted lump-sum appropriations and a lavish expenditure of money unequaled in the history of the Republic. Such action was justified because we were at war; but the emergency has now passed, and the bars should be put up again, and Congress should assume the responsibility of placing a check upon the lavish expenditure of the public moneys. Lump-sum appropriations should be discouraged. Europe thinks we are rolling in wealth, and naturally they want us to finance the world. But every dollar you appropriate must come out of the pockets of the American people, and there may be a limit to their endurance.

The longer I listened to the arguments that have been made to-day, confused as they were, about our purposes and our desires and the necessities on the other side of the ocean, the more respect I had for the admonitions of George Washington in his Farewell Address, when he warned us to beware of foreign entanglements. [Applause.]

I do not believe we should be appropriating money to pay tribute for justice. If we, upon our merits, can not get justice at the peace table, we can not get it by attempting to buy it. If I vote for this bill, I shall do so agreeing with the President of the United States that it is strictly a charitable proposition, and I do not want my country to be in the attitude of being charged with buying justice with American dollars, as some Members would make appear necessary.

I will not oppose this bill if it is amended so as to put a check on the distribution of the money, but I am opposed to making a lump-sum appropriation of a hundred million dollars for Herbert Hoover to distribute throughout the world as he sees fit.

I am opposed to trying to buy our way into Europe, either for the purposes of trade or otherwise, with American dollars. I am opposed to the idea that we must give billions as tribute in order to get justice at the peace table.

Those who are shortsighted enough to advocate such a course are not following the President's request, but are simply playing into the hands of Europe, and their leadership should be repudiated by the Members of this House, for such leadership will, just as sure as the days come and go, be repudiated by the people of this Nation. The spirit of the fathers of this country is not dead. The great mass of the American people still believe that we should look after America first and the rest of the world afterwards. They are still opposed to getting down on their knees to kings and princes, and they believe that we should play a man's part in the world's affairs and not the part of a cringing weakling trying to buy our way to favor. We have millions of men and millions of money for equity and justice and millions for deserving charity and for aiding humanity, but not one cent for tribute. If we place about the appropriation proper safeguards, we will be doing our fully duty at least in that regard. [Applause.]

The Washington Evening Star of January 11, last Saturday, printed the following in regard to this bill:

* * * * * * *

Administration officials are deeply concerned about the delay of Congress in appropriating the fund. Friends of President Wilson believe opposition to this appropriation may affect seriously the prestige of the representatives of the United States at the peace table.

Under the terms of the allied agreement, by which Herbert C. Hoover was put in charge of the rationing of the world's food supply, it is believed here that, acting under authority of President Wilson, Mr. Hoover promised that the United States would take the part in the proposed plan indicated by the President's request for the $100,000,000 appropriation. Exact details of the arrangement under which Mr. Hoover acts have not been received here.

Should Congress repudiate the President's request, following its failure to accept Secretary McAdoo's suggestion that a $500,000,000 revolving fund be established, from which to make loans to the allies, it is contended that the President will be placed in an anomalous position.

* * * * * * *

The reason given by administration officials for not specifying more definitely to whom the food supplies are to go is that Mr. Hoover should be left free to meet changing conditions as the needs arise.

* * * * * * *

It is held by supporters of the administration that the United States already has suffered, both in friendly feeling and in commercial prospects, by the declination of Congress to authorize peace-time loans to allied nations. Other powers will be found to make the loans, and trade naturally will follow in the wake of these loans, it is argued. Japan is ready to make loans, it is understood here, and thus she will be able to extend her influence in a trade field where, it is held, the United States should seize every opportunity of gaining a firm foothold.

The statements set out in that article have been confirmed by majority leaders upon the floor of this House this morning. It has been contended that in order that we may have influence at the peace table we must make this hundred-million-dollar appropriation. It has been contended that in order that the President and our representatives may have prestige in Europe and be enabled to secure certain concessions and the justice for which they are contending that we must pay tribute by way of appropriating millions of dollars to be expended in Europe. I do not believe that any thoughtful man would want to go on record as sustaining such a course or advocating such a policy. Either we are giving this money to aid the starving or we should not give it at all, and we should have no other purpose in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] desire further recognition?

Mr. GILLETT. How does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Kentucky 15½ minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I have insisted from the beginning that Congress should have information that would justify it in making this appropriation. I still insist that that is not only the right but the duty of Congress. No information has been given here to-day by anybody advocating this appropriation that justifies the Congress in taking this amount of money from the Treasury. The country has just gotten through with giving $225,000,000 to the Red Cross and six other allied organizations. This money is in the hands of those organizations to-day for charitable purposes. It is in the hands of persons who are in Europe and on the way over there. Within five minutes I have spoken to an agent of the American Red Cross who leaves to-morrow for Europe for the purpose of doing the very work that it is proposed to do by this apprpriation, and the American Red Cross is an organization that extends into every section of Europe. They know every part of that country where there is hunger and want. Not a member of that organization appeared before the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Rules in support of this appropriation. They did not ask for a dollar. They are in possession of information that could be given to the Congress and to the country in justification of this appropriation if there is such evidence. The only information here comes from an alleged survey made by Mr. Hoover of the conditions in Europe. He went upon his own motion or by appointment from the President to seek justification for a continuation of his activities as a dispenser of charity and a controller of food products. On the 9th day of January, 1919, the day the Committee on Rules had this matter up, an Associated Press dispatch from Paris covering the question of food distribution to the people of the central powers and the Balkans commented on the lifting of the embargo and the effect that that would have, and stated that that was one of the things that would be considered by the peace conference. But up to this time, the dispatch stated, all that had been done had been done by Mr. Hoover; that up to that time England and Italy had not yet appointed food commissioners to consider the subject. It is plain to me that Mr. Hoover's activities in Paris and in London had not impressed England and Italy up to that time with the importance of appointing food commissioners and of engaging in the activities that he was urging this country to engage in.

There is too much of a disposition on the part of Congress to appropriate lavishly out of the Treasury upon these requests without justification or proper information. The allied representatives—and I speak of them separate from the United States—are approaching the peace table with their minds on indemnity, on the restoration of the statu quo ante bellum. They are approaching the peace table with a determination to secure from the vanquished foe indemnity for every wrong done and for every dollar spent during the war. I have not heard of a word from our peace commissioners as to a request for indemnity or for money spent during the war. On the other hand, it was naively stated from Paris yesterday that it will be suggested to the American peace commissioners that it would be a most magnanimous action on their part to relinquish all claims for the return of the moneys we have advanced to the allied powers—relinquish claims for the return of moneys advanced to England, France, and Italy. The allies have no hesitation in looking at the proposition from the cold-blooded financial viewpoint.

Sob stuff has been given us here to-day for the purpose of getting $100,000,000 out of the Treasury. Mr. Chairman, it will take hard work to produce $100,000,000 by the American people to pay this sum. I am thinking of those who will have it to pay. Our first duty is to the people of the United States. We have prepared to do charity by giving $225,000,000 to organizations that are prepared actively to engage in charitable work in the war zone of Europe. That has all been done by voluntary contributions by the American people. I repeat that no justification has been given here to warrant Congress in taking $100,000,000 out of the Treasury to do a charitable work that already has been provided for through the American Red Cross and other organizations, seven in number, with representatives extending throughout the countries affected by the war.

We must get below the clouds and take a practical view of the things plainly in sight. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I will attempt to give some of the information asked for by the various speakers this afternoon. Some gentlemen I could not answer. Unfortunately, in my branch of the service we were not trained in the defense of gas attacks. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, this proposition is entirely in keeping with our obligations and the ideals which we told our boys we were fighting for. It has nothing to do with Bolshevism; it is not going to destroy Bolshevism. It is not charity, and, if it is a charity, gentlemen, it is entirely unbecoming to the American people to give charity with as much grudging as you are going to give this money. [Applause.]

Every military authority will agree with me that Germany could not have been beaten had we not first destroyed Austria-Hungary. Austria-Hungary was destroyed and the surrender of Germany followed. Credit is due to the Italian Army for the destruction and defeat of the Austro-Hungarian Army. But, gentlemen, what did more than anything else to disrupt Austria-Hungary internally was the President's 14-points peace message. [Applause.] We took that message, translated it into 14 languages, and delivered it by the ton in the Austrian territory. The Austrians feared that message more than they did our bombs, because they served notice that any aviator captured distributing pamphlets of that nature would be immediately hung.

The gentleman from New York, my colleague, Mr. SNELL, says that he wants some scrutiny here. I will tell the gentleman that we will have the scrutiny of the whole world; our representatives will have to make good; the $100,000,000 of food must be judiciously apportioned—to place it where it belongs—or we will hear about it.

I appeared before the representatives of the Jugo-Slav conference at a gathering in Rome, not as a representative of this House, not as an American soldier, but as an American citizen, and I told them in April that if they could break loose from the Hapsburg yoke, if they could establish a government that we could trust, that we would help them. I told them that we were eager to assist the oppressed people of the world. Now, did we mean it then or are we going to renig now?

Did we not war against the central powers because we believed that it was our duty to take a decisive stand with the civilized nations of the world? Let us for a moment read the closing words of the great war message of April 2, 1917.

The President said, in closing:

It is a distressing and oppressive duty, gentlemen of the Congress, which I have performed in thus addressing you. There are, it may be, many months of fiery trial and sacrifice ahead of us. It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war, into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars, civilization itself seeming to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treasured. God helping her, she can do no other.

Those are the principles for which we fought, and now that we have won the war we must make good and see these unfortunate people at least started on the right path to self-government. We did not intend to liberate them from Hapsburg or Hohenzollern oppression and then stand idly by and permit them to starve.

Now, this food is necessary. The remark was made that the allies ought to do their part. When Italy had not sufficient food for herself, for her own people, she sent food to feed the Serbian Army. I say that in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]; and a pound of bread meant more to Italy in those dark days than a thousand tons means to us to-day. The remarks from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], although he is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, show that he is not at all familiar with the military activities on the Austrian front.

Gentlemen, let us be frank. So much has been said about the allies doing their share. In answer to that I say that the allies did more than their share for three long years fighting Germany while Germany was sinking our boats, murdering our citizens, and we were making up our minds what to do. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] said that we are going to give something to the Czecho-Slovaks, "a nation on paper." I will say to the gentleman that that "nation on paper" had an army in the field fighting long before our Army was in the field, that when the Russian Army broke entirely it was the Czecho-Slovaks that held the line. I say to the gentleman that regiments and companies of Czecho-Slovaks surrendered to the Italians and refused to go to the rear, but turned around and fought against the Austrians. They would not go to the rear lines until they demonstrated that they surrendered for the purpose of fighting the Hapsburg Army. At one time 300 of them were captured and hanged immediately. The Czecho-Slovaks have earned every bit of liberty that they are going to enjoy. We can not do too much for them. The gentleman also says that the war is now over, that it is not necessary to vote this money under the duress of war. I am glad we are in a position to vote this money, now that hostilities have ceased, in keeping with our obligation and the principles we told the world we were fighting for, without duress. Let the world know that this is the free will of the representatives of the American people. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] says that we should act on judgment and not on emotions. I will say to the gentleman, who has had some experience in preaching, that I would refer him to Bernard Shaw's Major Barbara. "You can not talk religion to a man with hunger in his eyes." And likewise you can not preach self-government and liberty to people in a starving land.

There seems to be doubt as to the necessity of this food being so urgently needed. Everyone rejoiced when the news was flashed, shortly after the defeat of the Austrian Army, that the Jugo-Slavs had agreed among themselves to establish a government embracing and uniting all of the Slav countries of the Balkans. The word "Jugo" means southern and nothing else. I say this because some Member might still be under the impression, like the friend of Mr. Dooley, that it is some sort "of canned meat." The population of Bosnia and Herzegovina according to the last census is about 1,898,000; Croatia and Slavonia has 2,600,000; Serbia about 3,000,000; Montenegro, 436,789; Dalmatia, about 650,000. These Provinces would constitute the greater part of the Jugo-Slav confederacy, about ten or twelve million people in all. Besides this, there is the city of Fiume, with about 50,000, and Trieste and Istria, with 940,000. It is safe to say that in not one of these Provinces is there any supply of food. There is no crop in Serbia, absolutely none in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and the crop in Istria and Dalmatia is very meager and limited. These are some of the people that must be fed immediately. I do not believe it is necessary to give you figures of the Czeko-Slovak Provinces and Poland, for no doubt you are quite familiar with them and conditions there. This bill is certain of passage, and I urge my friends of this House not to attach any strings to it or do anything which might embarrass our representatives at the peace conference. England will certainly do her full share in this vast undertaking of assisting our allies or new friends of newly formed governments. England has always responded with her full quota, be it men, money, or food, whenever required. France and Italy will surely do everything within the limits of their resources to cooperate with us. Let us put all of our heart in this measure, and let us lend, or give if necessary, willingly and cheerfully. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the hour is late and we have listened to a great many arguments both for and against this proposition during the day. I presume gentlemen who are here are anxious to reach a vote and that further arguments will not have much weight. We have heard a great many arguments here why this appropriation should be made, but we have not been given a single reason. We have not had a single fact that can justify action. I voted for the war; I voted for everything connected with the war; and I have done, in common with other Americans, everything that is necessary to bring about victory. The President of the United States on the 2d day of December said that the war is over and we are at peace with the world. The Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War say that the Army is being demobilized; that 1,150,000 of our soldiers have been ordered discharged; that we are discharging them at the rate of 30,000 a day. Fleets of ships are coming in carrying wounded soldiers from the other side and discharged men. Moneys are being expended out of the Treasury of the United States in fabulous sums. Taxes are being levied upon the American people as they never have been levied before. These taxes will continue for the next generation, no matter what we may do now. The American people are looking forward to the time when relief will come to them. Hundreds of thousands of men will be coming back from the other side, out of employment, and they will be in a starving condition in many cases before they will find a job. We have starvation existing in some cases in America now. It is not long since that the people of the Southern States appealed to the Congress to help them when the price of cotton was so low that everybody was out of funds down there. We believed then that we were not justified in voting money from the Public Treasury for private use. In 1913 there were 4,000,000 men idle in America. The bread lines then, under the present administration, were longer than they ever had been before. Did anyone suggest that we appropriate $100,000,000 to feed America's starving men that were standing in the bread line at that time? Will anyone appeal to the Treasury of the United States to feed them now, if necessary? I doubt it. We have been told that at the request of President Roosevelt we voted an appropriation of $800,000 for the relief of the Italians on account of the earthquake at Messina. Yes, we did; we voted $800,000 that they might be fed and cared for medically and surgically, but we were told specifically what the money was to be used for. We knew the facts in the case. An earthquake had swept these people into death and ruin and starvation. They were unable to relieve their own distress. The people for whom we propose now to appropriate this money could earn the bread which they need if they would but quit fighting among themselves and go to work. The more we feed them the less they will work. The American people are not willing that they should be taxed for the purpose for which this appropriation is asked. At any rate, they are not willing that we should appropriate $100,000,000 of their money until we know that the countries beside whom we fought are willing to contribute their share in cooperation with us.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not the time to yield. If they are willing to contribute their share of the fund, if they will agree to do that among the peace commissioners of which the President of the United States is one, and he will send word to the Congress of the United States that in common with the allied nations he wants America to contribute its share to any charity which the world deems necessary and important, there will not be a man, woman, or child in America who will not say amen; but to say, without information, without facts, without knowledge, that we must be the only Nation to contribute to a fund like this is to say that we are willing to impose upon the American people to an extent unlimited. We have already spent $25,000,000,000 of their money to win the war. We have yet many billions of dollars to pay. We are maintaining a great Army and a great Navy that will not be all demobilized for the next two years. We will call upon the American people soon for the payment of a $6,000,000,000 tax. We will call upon them also for the purchase of $6,000,000,000 more of liberty bonds. We will continue to tax them to the limit during more than the coming generation. We will find ourselves in the not far distant future in need of help for our own people, but notwithstanding that I would be willing to be one of 110,000,000 of people to contribute to the fund now sought as a citizen of America but I am not willing to cast my vote to take this $100,000,000 out of the pockets of an already overtaxed people

Let us appeal to the charity of America in its private capacity. They have already in the not far distant past contributed $225,000,000 to the Red Cross for just the very purpose this $100,000,000 is sought. Let us contribute $200,000,000 more, if necessary, out of our private purses; but do not let us as the spokesmen of America prostitute the Treasury of the United States instead of giving of our private means to provide for any charitable necessities that may exist either in this country or anywhere else throughout the world. Stop it. The time is come when we must call a halt to this extravagant waste of public funds. Stop it or the people of America will soon stop you. Stop the extravagance. We have been going on and on in a headlong rush of extravagant waste until we do not know what we are doing, but the time is come to call a halt and this is the place to call it. Let the President of the United States formulate his plan in common with the allied nations with whom he sits and give the information that will justify action by the American people through their spokesmen in the American Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all gentlemen who have spoken have that right.

The CHAIRMAN. That can not be done in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRYNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois who preceded me complained that we have not sufficient information and details as to the plan to be adopted in the distribution of food that will be purchased and as to the amount of expense that will be borne by our Government, and, really, that is the chief complaint made by gentlemen who oppose this resolution. It is, of course, very desirable to have all the information available when we vote upon any appropriation and particularly upon an appropriation of this magnitude. But we are 3,000 miles away and there is no opportunity for the Congress to get in touch with representatives of the allied powers. There is a great American now in Europe who is in touch with the allied powers and who has cabled to the Congress requesting this appropriation. While we talk here people are starving in Europe, and I for one am willing to trust the President of the United States, whom the people have trusted and do trust, to safeguard the interests of the American people and their Treasury. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] said that the United States Government was to be the great almoner of Europe. That I deny. I would not vote for a resolution which had for its purpose the financing solely by the United States Government of the whole project of feeding the starving in Europe, or even for paying the greater portion of that burden. It is true, as the gentleman from Kansas has stated, that the Governments of Europe are at the peace table asking for either territory or indemnity on account of the war and that our Government is the only great power which is not asking for an indemnity. We are asking only that a peace be agreed upon which will have as its chief corner stone the recognition of the rights of the people everywhere and which will be made as permanent as human endeavor can possibly make it. This fact, Mr. Chairman, does not absolve us from all obligation arising by reason of our participation in the war. But I deny that we are to do more than our fair share, along with the Governments of Great Britain, France, and Italy. We have the assurances of the peace commissioners and the representatives of the United States who are now in Europe that our Government will not be expected to shoulder the burden alone.

Cablegrams have been read here to the House, statements have been made as to the extent to which Great Britain and Italy are now furnishing food to the suffering and starving in Europe, and an interallied commission has been appointed to handle these funds. And it seems to me that sufficient evidence has been presented to the Congress that our Government is not expected and will not be required to bear anything more than a reasonable and proper proportion of the burden which rests upon our Government and the allied powers of Europe.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] has stated that nothing had been read from the hearings showing that this Government would not be expected to do more than bear its just and fair proportion. I want to read from page 5 of the hearings the statement made by a representative of the Government who appeared before the committee in support of this appropriation.

Mr. GORDON. What was his name?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Glasgow. He says:

> The purpose of this appropriation, as we gather from the cables, is that England and France—Italy not yet having signified her ability to put up her proportion—have agreed to put up their proper proportion of the relief fund necessary to take care of the starving people throughout Europe, and, at the President's request, this $100,000,000 would be America's contribution to the common fund. It is not the purpose to use any part of this fund for charitable contributions where there is a possibility that those starving people can by any means, by securities or by money, pay for it, but the purpose is to use it as a revolving fund for handling the situation so far as possible, but in certain isolated cases where it is impossible to get payment at once it is to be used to relieve the starvation and anarchy.
> That, Mr. Chairman, is about the situation.
> The assurance we get is that England and France will pay their proportion. Mr Rickard, who is thoroughly familiar with the Belgian relief work, informs me that in the Belgian relief work, which has been carried on with remarkable success throughout its entire career, England and France contributed to that relief just twice what America contributed. That is the only guide we have as to what may be the proportions in which the contributions will be made.

The President tells us that this appropriation is necessary as our part of a fund to relieve the starving and put down anarchy in certain sections of Europe in order that where anarchy now prevails stable governments may be formed which are capable of entering into terms of permanent peace. I am not willing by my vote to help to paralyze the arm or handicap in any way our great President, who is now in Europe in the endeavor to carry out the wishes of the American people and to write a peace treaty which will save future generations from the terrible experiences of the past four years which have drenched the whole world with blood.

Say what you please, the American people are behind Woodrow Wilson. They have bidden him godspeed in his efforts. The heart of every father and mother, every soldier, every son and daughter, beats in sympathy with his efforts to bring about a permanent peace league. Do not delude yourselves with the idea that the people will look with patience upon the action of any party or any individual who throws an obstacle in his path, as the defeat of this resolution would do. The people would rather pay many times this appropriation and secure a quick and permanent peace and the early return of our boys than to have no appropriation made and see hostilities resumed or be threatened with another war in the early years to come. Do not by the defeat of this resolution make it possible for the President's opponents to detract from his great prestige in the allied countries by saying that he has not the support of the representatives of the American people, whom he is trying to serve and who are earnestly supporting him.

Mr. Chairman, I support this resolution because I regard it as distinctly a war measure. It is intimately connected with and grows out of the great war in which we have been engaged and which we have won. I will vote for it because I regard it as an obligation to the world which rests upon the United States Government and the allied powers in Europe on account of the great war. And certainly no true American would desire to see his country, rich, proud, powerful, and resourceful as it is, fail to measure up to the full obligation and responsibility resting upon it. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment, and then the gentleman can offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

> Be it enacted, That for the participation by the Government of the United States in the furnishing of foodstuffs and other urgent supplies, and for the transportation, distribution, and administration thereof to such populations in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President from time to time as necessary, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, in the discretion of the President, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $100,000,000, which may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1919, and which shall be audited, where practicable, in the same manner as other expenditures of the Government are audited: Provided, That expenditures hereunder shall be reimbursed, so far as possible by the governments or subdivisions thereof or the peoples to whom relief is furnished: Provided further, That a report of the receipts and expenditures under this appropriation shall be submitted to Congress not later than the first day of the next regular session.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 1, line 4, after the word "States," insert the words "in conjunction with the allies engaged in the war against the Imperial German Government."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of this bill, but if the bill is to pass I believe it should be amended and certain limitations should be put upon the expenditures, and that we should also insist that our allies should bear a fair proportion of this expense. I am not satisfied that the United States is getting that square deal in this war business to which it is entitled. I am not satisfied that our diplomacy up to date has been so wholly in the interest of the United States as it should have been. I am not satisfied that we are safeguarding our trade routes as they should be safeguarded. Every time a foreign nation desires to regard us as an "easy" people we seem "to fall for it." If it is money, we furnish the money; if it is men, we furnish the men; or, if distress prevails, then comes an appeal for charity and we help. All this time we ignore the fact that there are thousands at home, within our own jurisdiction, who knock at our door in vain for the encouragement Congress withholds. Bills remain upon the calendar for the relief of individuals and concerns in the United States until the parties in interest are dead, and we take no action. Appeals come up from the wives and children of our soldiers, now policing these foreign lands, and all we do is complain and find fault with the administrative officers. We take no hurried action to see that justice is done to our own people. Business men contend, owing to the increase in bureaus and the appropriations necessary for their maintenance, that they are hamstrung and limited in their trade affairs. We are told by them that the increase in the cost of living is due to the fact that we have been placing too much confidence in bureaucratic chiefs, like the gentleman who is now upon the other side of the water making arrangements to dispense American charity in foreign nations——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, as to Italy, France, Great Britain, and several other countries, Cuba—for instance—but if we are going to consult all those the people will be dead and buried on the other side that we want to help. I say that in the hope that the gentleman will amend his proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is older than I am, and holds a most respected place in this House. I am going to ask him if he has not heard these cries for relief coming up from the Far East ever since he has been a Member?

Mr. CANNON. That is foreign to the subject. We have been in this war, and are still in the war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am asking the gentleman if he has not heard, from the time he began his service in this House, these cries for relief from the Far East?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; and from the West as well as the East. We are committed to China, and we have done a lot of things.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman prevails in this, we would involve ourselves in these matters in Europe until we are compelled to add $100,000,000 and another $100,000,000, even until the people of the United States bleed. There is distress amongst our own people here just as there is amongst these restless people abroad.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman's amendment is the only suggestion in the way of real legislation that would involve us with foreign Governments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am trying to put the foreign nations on the plane of good faith with the United States, and I will tell the gentleman why: Have we tried to do business in South America recently? Yes; we have, and our War Trade Board, in conjunction with the British officials, have restricted the space on which we may go into the markets of the world. We have been held up at every point. While they are busy capturing trade, our food prices are going up. While we are providing food for others we are forcing our own food prices so high——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five minutes more. He has not had a chance to speak in general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. I shall not object in this instance, but in order that it may not in the future carry any personal phase to it, I shall object to undue extensions under the five-minute rule. I think the House wants to vote on the amendments as offered and finish the business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman object in this instance?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not object in this instance, but in order that in the future it may not carry any personal phase, I announced that I shall object to undue extensions hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky for withholding his objection for the present. When the gentleman, who is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, was on the floor I endeavored to ask him a question. He was interested in his subject and could not at that time accord me an answer. I wanted to ask him then how much money had been spent of the first $100,000,000 we turned over to the discretion of the President for such use as he saw fit during this war. I wanted to ask him how much money Mr. Hoover, the Food Administrator, had spent since the President appointed him to that high charge. I wanted to know whether at the present time the funds of the United States, whether of the President's $100,000,000 fund or not, were going into these foreign countries for the relief of these people, and I wanted to know whether it was an afterthought or whether it was due to the ostentatious reception given to our representatives on the other side, that the thought had come to them that they were to play Kris Kingle to the people of Europe? [Applause.]

I was wondering, then, if the gentleman would answer me as to the amount of taxes we are obliged to levy upon the people of the United States. The gentleman is on the Committee on Appropriations, which spends our money; I am on the Committee on Ways and Means, which raises it. This morning I was unable to participate in the debate, because in conference we were deliberating upon the methods of imposing an additional burden of taxation that may run up to $8,000,000,000, which the people of the United States will have to pay. The burden is heavy, and now that war profits are no more, we were proposing to distribute that taxation, to take it not only from the profiteers but to spread it all over the country. We must make the farmer pay and the industrial worker. All along the line they must bear the expense of this war. We were considering these things. I wanted to know whether these $100,000,000 funds, which were new in this country three years ago, and which seemed to be enormous when we began them, are being properly expended, and it made no difference to me whether they were being expended by the President of the United States, by Mr. Hoover, or bureau chiefs down along the line. The money thus spent must be paid by the people of the United States, who are not aware, I am sure, that their Congress is endeavoring to make them, by the passage of this bill, the almoners of the entire earth. [Applause.]

I have seen widows, I have seen wives of soldiers in distress here. I have seen children clinging to the breasts of their mothers in the United States. You do not have to carry me over to Armenia for pictures of misery and distress. I have seen American collectors on the streets begging for Armenians, when American women, passing by with children clinging to them, have asked, "If this money goes to Armenia what will become of us?" We have plenty of pitiful stories right here at home.

I have here the evidence of the tax that the American soldier boys have been paying upon the ships of foreign nations carrying them abroad for a price, to protect the people over there. I have evidence of the commissary established by money makers on these ships, taxing our boys out of the paltry wages we are paying them to lay down their lives on the other side. I have some evidence of the taxes that are levied upon the expenditures of our soldiers on the other side. They pay heavily for everything they buy and some of them come back penniless. I know that every claim that is set up against us over there for aiding in the establishment of "democracy throughout the world" has been made a matter of record, and that we are paying lavishly for every damage done, and knowing all this I thought the gentleman from Kentucky might be able, when I asked him the question, to tell us something about it. I think we might well be informed whether we are throwing this $100,000,000 away for the gratification of a few individuals who want to be philanthropic and generous with other people's money, or whether it is an attempt on the part of somebody "to put something over on us." I wanted to know whether somebody, national or individual, was trying to unfairly involve the United States, and I think the time has come for us to find out. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CANNON moves to amend the amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania by adding after the word "allies" the words "Great Britain, France, and Italy," so that the amendment will read:

"Page 1, line 4, after the word 'States,' insert the words 'in conjunction with the allies, Great Britain, France, and Italy engaged in the war against the Imperial German Government.'"

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment to perfect the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Without that amendment the gentleman's amendment would kill the object of the bill if it was adopted. The Central American States, Cuba, and many other nations, have allied themselves with us in this war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will accept the gentleman's amendment if it is confined to France, Italy, and Great Britain.

Mr. CANNON. Very well, the gentleman modifies his amendment, and I want to ask him now, with that amendment, is he willing to support the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am frank to say that I will not support it, because I think the precedent would be a very bad one, indeed.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is my personal and political friend, and I would not say anything to hurt his feelings, but I must be true to my own views. I must be reconciled to myself and perform my duty as I see it. The gentleman in his remarks has spoken about starvation in the United States, about women with children asking alms. I am here to say that, so far as I am informed and believe, here in the United States we are organized to relieve those who are not able to relieve themselves, and we are quite as well off in that respect now as we have ever been in the United States. [Applause.] In my own city, and in every other city, township, and county, thank God, we are organized to give relief to distress. Sometimes the people who ask relief are not candid. Sometimes relief is given, even by residents of the United States, where the people relieved might support themselves by industry. We are no worse off in that respect than we were before this war was declared. [Applause.]

I want to say one other thing, and I must insist upon it. The gentleman says the war is over. Somebody has said that Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States, has said that the war is over. What he said was, "So the war comes to an end." But he did not mean it when he said it, because the war can not be over until peace is made. Now, how is peace to be made between the warring powers? Our principal enemies are Germany and Austria. In the beginning Russia was one of our allies. No other countries except the three that I have mentioned, Great Britain, France, and Italy, joined with us can give assurances that the terms of peace will be enforced, because the other countries have not organized governments. I pray God that the Czecho-Slovaks and the Jugo-Slavs and Serbia and Roumania may come in, but there is a proposal in the newspapers that Germany shall be taxed $40,000,000,000. Is there any government in Germany to assent to such a tax? Why, in the Far East Bolshevism is universal and progressing in Germany.

I am not afraid of this $100,000,000 being misappropriated. The gentleman says, and other gentlemen have said, "Oh, it is the entering wedge." Good God, you can not make any appropriation in this Congress that will be an entering wedge, that will bind any future Congress. After the 4th of March the next Congress will be here, either in extra session or in regular session later on. I hope we will not be sidetracked with embarrassing amendments and that we will get a vote upon this bill to-night.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I very much deplore the lack of information which we have from the President in regard to this appropriation. It seems to me that Congress might have been taken somewhat further into the confidence of the President regarding the needs of the appropriation and proposed application of the money. But I regard this proposition as purely something which grows out of and is a part of the war. The peoples who will be benefited by this appropriation are those who have joined with us, or we have joined with them, in making war. And because of the war there is the shortage of food supplies there. If our Army were in the Balkans, with starving people on every side, we would criticize the Army if it did not give to the starving people a portion of the rations which we had furnished to the Army. And while I deplore the lack of information given to us by the President, I do not feel disposed to punish the starving people of southeastern Europe because of any failure of the President to give the information. [Applause.]

We know enough about what has taken place in Europe to believe that there is a shortage of food there, that there is danger of starvation there because of the war, and when we believe that there is the danger of starvation there, that peoples are starving for lack of food, I think it would be proper for us, as a part of the war expense, to help feed them until peace comes to them in their own localities. [Applause.]

Of course, I hope and believe that the expenditures of any money by this country there will be joined with expenditures by Great Britain and France. I have no doubt that will be the case. I do not think that we ought to hesitate to give the money now, so that it can be used as soon as possible. Before we could acquire the information, if we waited, these people will have passed beyond. Their government will still be disorganized and anarchy will still prevail. It is to our interest as a country to establish not merely the forms of government there early, but to establish real peace there. I do not believe that all the troops from the United States will be returned to-morrow. There is danger over there yet, and we would not be willing then to have the danger show up and send our troops back, but if we can establish a stable government in the Balkans and southeastern Europe we then can safely bring home our boys from Europe. We ought to establish a stable government in Germany. I had hoped that our troops would march into Berlin and establish a government there. That ought to have been done, but we ought now to see to it that as soon as possible a stable form of government is established in those countries and that our troops may return to peaceful pursuits at home. [Applause.]

For these reasons I shall support the bill, because I do not believe we ought to take the responsibility on our side of turning down the first request the President has made in connection with the peace table, when the danger of starvation threatens these people if we refuse the request. If it was a matter of punishing the President I might join in the punishment. I am not willing to punish other people because of the failure of the President to properly perform his duty in giving information to Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, during the debate some of the gentlemen who have spoken seemed almost to doubt the urgency of the situation over there. As I listened to these gentlemen I was reminded of a meeting that I attended in this city one Sunday afternoon three years ago, at the home of Miss Boardman, then and now the head of the local Red Cross. About 100 members of the Senate and the House were present, together with a number of the residents of this city.

We were invited to hear a Mr. Wolcott, then recently returned from Europe, where he had been prominently connected with the American Red Cross, describe what he saw in Poland. It was a vivid recital. I have time to mention only two or three of the many incidents of which he told us, and which he said were typical of countless thousands in Poland alone.

In company with an officer he was one day walking along the street during a snowstorm when he noticed, near the walk, a little mound of snow. Pushing his cane down into it they found a boy about 7 or 8 years of age, unconscious, with the emaciated arms and legs, the swollen stomach, and the bulging eyes of those who suffer from starvation. They carried him to a house and he revived sufficiently to tell them that he had had nothing to eat for two days; that two days before he had had a crust of bread, and that was all, and he died—starved to death.

The speaker threw on a screen pictures he had taken for the Red Cross in Poland. One was of a long, low, white structure in front of which were seated a number of persons. Among these was one to whom he directed especial attention, saying she was an anemic woman whom he at first thought must die of hunger, but whom they succeeded in saving. In the building back of her, when the picture was taken, were more than 100 men lying on the floor, of whom more than 100 died of starvation, and among them was her husband. This woman had lost her husband and six children in 12 days from starvation.

Gentlemen who doubt the urgency of the situation should remember that these incidents occurred three years ago, and that conditions have steadily grown worse.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the notice that I served sometime ago I feel constrained to object to an extension of time, though personally I should like to have the gentleman continue, but I must follow the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether he is going to accept this amendment?

Mr. SHERLEY. I expect to discuss the amendment and am prepared to discuss it at this time, but I realize that a number of gentlemen who had not spoken under general debate are desirous of speaking briefly now, and for that reason I have not claimed the floor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not care for recognition to discuss anything except the amendment, and I really do not care for recognition to discuss that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am ready to discuss the amendment now.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say simply this touching the amendment: There is not, in my judgment, the slightest doubt of the fact that England, France, and Italy have agreed to cooperate with the United States, and that they will cooperate, and I have that statement, as I have repeatedly said to this House, from the cables that have been sent by our representatives in France to the State Department and transmitted to me. There are two objections, to my mind, to legislating it into this bill. The amendment as offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] would require cooperation and work on the part of all the allies. Manifestly that would not be a practical thing. In order to remedy that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] suggests three allies; but you get out of one dilemma only to get into another, because then you confine the activities to the four allies—England, France, Italy, and the United States. I submit in all candor, in good faith to this House, that the attempt by this language to narrow activities is a mistake. We are dealing in Europe with affairs of tremendous moment. I do not share at all the suspicions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania touching the good faith of our allies. I have not shared his suspicions in the past touching our allies, and I do not share them now. I do not think it is necessary to write in here the names of the different nations. I do not think it is becoming for this Nation to undertake to arrange the detail of cooperation with other nations upon the same terms that men might arrange a horse deal or participation by individual Members in connection with personal matters. The language of the bill provides for the participation by the Government of the United States in furnishing these various things. Let us be frank. You are not going to really safeguard your $100,000,000 by that language, and all you do is to add what, in my judgment, is simply evidence of bad taste. I hope both amendments will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and for the information of the House, without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Madden amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which the Clerk, without objection, will again report for the information of the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I had accepted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But the committee did not.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no unanimous consent given for its acceptance. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the Moore amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the noes had it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 42, noes 85.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GILLETT: Page 4, line 6, after the word "furnished" insert "and no part of said sum shall be expended until Great Britain, France, and Italy shall have agreed to contribute to the relief herein provided their fair share thereof as determined by the President in view of the interest and economic ability of said nations."

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up the time of the committee, as I have already discussed this measure, but this amendment goes somewhat further than that offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. It simply provides that Great Britain, France, and Italy shall contribute fairly. Now, I do not agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that it is at all a slight upon those nations for us to say that they ought to contribute their fair share, too. The gentleman, in fact, says the reason why we need not do this is that he is satisfied they will do it. Well, perhaps they will and perhaps they will not. They certainly will not do it unless they feel that it is necessary. They will not do it if our $100,000,000 alone is enough. This may end the need or we may be entering into a very far-reaching support of those nations, and it seems to me it is but fair that the United States should say, "We are glad to contribute; we will contribute liberally, but you ought to contribute such an amount as your interests and your economic condition makes reasonable." I do not say what that is. I leave that in this amendment to be decided by the President of the United States. It seems to me that is a fair, reasonable, and proper limitation to be put on this bill. I believe it really carries out what is the view of every man in this House that the other nations ought to cooperate with us in this charity, and I do not believe that either of the other nations would conceive it was an insult for us to make our appropriation dependent upon their also contributing their fair amount. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GILLETT) there were—ayes 55, noes 94.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana and Mr. McCULLOCH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 1, lines 10 and 11, after the word "President," insert "and to be expended through the American Red Cross."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Just reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make or reserve the point of order?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order that it is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to be heard?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I desire to be heard. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that it is germane——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will wait a minute——

Mr. MANN. It is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May the amendment be again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, a member of the committee.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have made the point of order; I will reserve it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will reserve it if the gentleman wants to speak to it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I insist that this amendment is germane. This money is to be expended through some agency. It has been repeatedly said here by the proponents of this measure that it is to be expended through this international food-supply organization of which Mr. Hoover is the head and appointed by the President.

Now, that being true, it is perfectly germane to change the agency and define what the agency is through which it shall be expended. I take it for granted that the majority of gentlemen here want to get the best possible results from this legislation. If it is for the purpose of relieving the distress throughout Europe, why not place it in the hands of that agency that is prepared and qualified to see that every dollar of it goes for the purposes for which we desire to expend it. Why should we be taking and expending a large portion of it for the purpose of paying for cargoes of pork already over there and those that are on the way over there, directed, if you please, by this new agency? If it is to be expended for the relief of distressed Europe, place it in the hands of those men and women who have been relieving the distress of Europe since this war commenced, who are in the localities, if you please, where this distress is, and who get their information first hand, and who are not engaged constantly around banquet tables and know nothing of the facts except by hearsay. [Applause.]

The American people have responded, as no people on the face of the earth have ever responded, to charity, and to every war necessity. It is time that they were being informed now as to how the future expenditures are to be made. We will be going before the people presently asking for another loan of $5,000,000,000; soon after that for another loan of $5,000,000,000. The American people have a right to know, now that the war is over, and when they have a right to ask questions, how this money of theirs is being expended. There is no right in law for the expenditure of this money at all. And no man can maintain that there is, unless it be by the exigency of war—a war that the President has said in this House is ended.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman vote for the bill if his proposed amendment is adopted?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely. I will vote for it. I want to see that this money is expended for the purpose for which we are intending it. [Applause.] No one here doubts but what the Red Cross can expend this money better than any new agency that is now being organized over there. And no one doubts but what they have the information with reference to where this distress exists and where the relief can be best applied. Why should we then furnish a new overhead, with all the expenses necessary to that overhead, and put it in force so that it can expend this money?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know that the President has indorsed the plan of the American committee to raise $30,000,000 to be expended in the Far East, and much of this money is collected and in the war chest now?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. The papers are full of it. But I want to confine myself to the matter immediately before us. I take it that everyone here is acting in good faith in reference to this thing, and my only opposition to it before the committee and here is the medium through which this money is to be expended. My belief is that there will not be one-half of it that will go for the purposes we are voting it for if it is placed in the hands of this new agency. My belief, on the other hand, is that every dollar of it will go for the purposes we are voting it for if it is placed in the hands of the Red Cross. Who has heard of any money being diverted from their purposes by the Red Cross?

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. ROBBINS. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that his amendment, which names the distributing agency as the "Red Cross" is incorrect. I read from chapter 23, session 3, of the Fifty-eighth Congress, which incorporates this organization, and I find the proper corporate name is the "American National Red Cross." It is important that the proper corporate name be given, if it is to perform this very important international charitable work.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will ask that it be changed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman that the amendment of the gentleman is not correct so far as it applies to lines 10 and 11. It applies to lines 9 and 10, and, without objection, the changes indicated by the Chair will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would the gentleman have the official representatives of this Government in dealing with the official representatives of other Governments, deal with them through the medium of a private organization?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What is the organization that has just been created over there but a number of citizens, two designated from this country, namely, Mr. Davis and Mr. Hoover? Two were designated by France, two were designated by England—a new combination, if you please. We ought not to quibble about the agency through which this money is to be spent. It is the result, I dare say, that we are all wanting, and if we want the best possible result, why not give it to that agency whose business it is to expend money in this way? [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order and desire simply to say this in connection with the amendment offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is perfectly impracticable to adopt this amendment and to put into effect the cooperation which gentlemen on the other side, including the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], have so greatly urged. I know nothing that warrants the belief that this money will not be properly expended by the President and by the representatives he has named upon this allied food commission, and I do know that the Red Cross has been dependent in the past, as it is to-day, for much of its information and much of its help in granting its relief to the allied food commissions that have existed and that do now exist. I hope the amendment will be defeated. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if you write a letter up to the War Department to-day and ask the War Department in reference to some soldier in France who has been killed or wounded, some one, perhaps, who may be in a hospital, the distinguished gentlemen who run the War Department will refer you to the American Red Cross. [Applause.] They will tell you that they have to rely upon the American Red Cross for any information concerning any soldier boy of the Republic in a hospital in France. And it does seem to me that if the Army admits either its own incompetency or the utmost competency of the Red Cross in giving information concerning men in the service of the United States abroad, we might very properly use the machinery of the American Red Cross in distributing charity in Europe. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is presented upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana and Mr. SNYDER demanded a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for. Those who favor the amendment will rise and remain standing. [After counting.] One hundred and one gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and remain standing. [After counting.] One hundred and nineteen gentlemen have risen in opposition.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are asked for. Those who favor the taking of the vote by tellers will rise and be counted. [After counting.] Evidently a sufficient number have risen.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. SHERLEY and Mr. WOOD of Indiana to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 103, noes 129.

The CHAIRMAN. On this vote the ayes are 103 and the noes are 129.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we could not hear the announcement of the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The announcement of the vote was ayes 103, and noes 129. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCULLOCH: Strike out in line 7 the words "the President" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "a commission, to consist of three members, one of which shall be appointed by the President, one of which shall be named by the Senate, and one by the House of Representatives; not more than two members of said commission shall be of the same political party."

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take more than a minute.

It has been admitted on both sides of the Chamber during the discussion that information in regard to how this fund is to be expended, where it is to go, and how it is to be administered, is very meager. The information received from the other side of the ocean is meager, and the information given the House by the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill has been exceedingly meager. I gathered from the newspaper report, to which I have already referred, just a portion of which I desire to call to the attention of the House now, something of what is to be done. In an article in the Evening Star on Saturday this paragraph appears:

The reason given by administration officials for not specifying more definitely to whom the food supplies are to go is that Mr. Hoover should be left free to meet changing conditions as the needs arise.

Now, I submit that on an appropriation of $100,000,000, which comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers of America, it would be as little as we could do to add to the medium of distribution one Member from the House and one Member from the Senate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to see how we could work out practically the amendment proposed by the gentleman in the event that it should be adopted. The amendment provides for one member appointed by the President, one elected by the Senate, and one elected by the House.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Elected or appointed, either way.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The amendment provides "elected." And it provides that no more than two of them shall be members of the same political party. Now, how are we going to arrange about the election, in the event that the gentleman's amendment prevails? If the President appoints one and appoints a Democrat, and the Senate elects one and elects a Democrat, then would we have to elect a Republican? Or if the President appoints a Republican, and the Senate elects a Republican, then will the House have to elect a Democrat? What is the practical result?

Mr. McCULLOCH. It perhaps does seem somewhat impracticable to one so partisan as the gentleman, but it will be more practicable after the 4th of March. There would be no trouble about it then. Now, I believe that the impracticability suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee would remedy itself. The proposition I am trying to advance is just this, That it is our duty now to place some safeguard around the expenditure of this money, and that this appropriation would be accepted by the people in a better spirit if they know that there is a supervising committee consisting in part of the representatives of the people; and I can not see, if there is nothing to this except charity and good will and justice and equity, why everybody should not be willing to have proper safeguards around it. For my part I will gladly and willingly vote for this bill if this amendment, or the amendment which will probably be offered in a motion to recommit, is adopted. I think we ought to do something. We owe it to the taxpayers to put some safeguard around the expenditure of this money.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I send up an amendment and ask that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized to offer an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LITTLE: Page 1, line 6, after the word "to," insert "the Armenians."

Mr. SHERLEY. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the Armenians have waited a thousand years to get a little attention from Christendom, and I did not know but I would have to wait as long before I got a hearing here.

For a thousand years the Armenians have been ground between the upper and the lower millstone, and they have not been pulverized yet. That means that they must necessarily be a race of the utmost stamina and entitled to the utmost consideration, and I am asking you to give it to them to-day. You wish to be charitable and to do a Christian thing. The universal voice of mankind will tell you that no race in the world is as needy to-day as is Armenia. No other race has suffered so and is suffering as much.

If you wish to reward a deserving race, no other race has endured as much as this race has endured for the cause for which we stand. They put 160,000 men into this war, first with the Russian Army, and then in their own army when they held the Turks for months, and at last they put 8,000 men with Allenby's army when he broke the power of the Turks. They are deserving because they have shown that they have the recuperative and self-sustaining power that with a little aid now will make them a great and powerful and rich nation. They are the industrious and ambitious people of all that vast area between the Caspian and the Mediterranean. They are the artisans and farmers of that land and the business men of the whole Turkish Empire, the only race that has demonstrated the capacity to organize and develop a nation. They are the one people who entered this war in chains and emerged with a recognized republic of their own, won by their own arms, the little Republic of Ararat. This mighty Christian Republic of the Occident should not overlook the rights of the first Christian nation which 1,500 years ago raised the banner of a Christian civilization in the Orient.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, Armenia is a part of Turkey in Asia?

Mr. LITTLE. It is the Christian part of Turkey. It lies right against the Caucasus. These people are of the same race and blood that we are. They just happened to land down there instead of in Europe.

Mr. CANNON. But this bill says Europe, and the Armenians are in Asia.

Mr. LITTLE. We do not undertake to take care of Europe. You will notice that this resolution says "the population of Europe," and these people are the same population and the same principle applies. The same reasoning applies. Turkey offered them more when this war began than our allies have as yet, but they cast their lot with us. They are Christians, they have suffered and endured for a thousand years, and they have shown a stability that entitles them to a chance to make their country great.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I doubt the wisdom of adopting the language in the form in which the gentleman has suggested it.

Mr. LITTLE. I should be glad to have a suggestion.

Mr. SHERLEY. I just wanted to make a suggestion to the gentleman. It occurred to me that perhaps the situation could be reached if the language in the bill was made to read "such populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany." That would deal with the situation without specifying any particular country.

Mr. LITTLE. If I accept that, will the gentleman accept my amendment?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am willing to offer the amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. Then I am through, and I am much obliged.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: After the word "Europe," in line 6, insert "and the countries contiguous thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer that as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman from Kansas will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to indicate that that would include all of Turkey.

Mr. SHERLEY. A part of Turkey is in Europe and a part of Turkey is out of Europe, and certainly that would be contiguous thereto.

Mr. LITTLE. I do not want any quibbling about it hereafter. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHERLEY: Page 1, line 6, after the word "Europe," insert "and countries contiguous thereto."

The amendment was agreed to.

Leave to extend remarks in the RECORD was granted to the following Members: Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania, Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. SCHALL, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. HERSEY, Mr. CANNON, Mr. ROBBINS, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, Mr. RUBEY, Mr. HUMPHREYS, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. GALLIVAN, Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, Mr. ROGERS, and Mr. LUNN.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendment to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule which was adopted the committee rises automatically.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill 13708, providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report it back forthwith with the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOOD of Indiana moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Page 1, line 10, after the word "President," insert "to be expended by the American National Red Cross."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 202, answered "present" 3, not voting 108, as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 14, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, at the beginning of a new day we lift our hearts to Thee and seek to draw from Thee day by day grace and courage and wisdom and strength for the battle of life. As we face the tremendous issues that are upon us to-day we would not face them alone, but, as our fathers did, we would gain Thy guidance and blessing. So we come, we trust, in the spirit of our fathers and in their faith lift our hearts to the God of Nations, praying that Thou wilt indue us plenteously with heavenly gifts and guide us in the discharge of our duty. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SHEPPARD and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AFFAIRS IN GREECE.

Mr. SPENCER. I send to the desk a resolution in the nature of a petition from citizens representing all the Greek societies, Greek community, and all Greeks who are American citizens, residents of the city of St. Louis, Mo., and vicinity, in meeting assembled on the 29th day of December, 1918, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD. The resolution deals with the rights of Hellenism, as they see it, at the peace conference.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, native Americans and American citizens of Greek birth, representing all the Greek societies, Greek community, and all Greek residents of the city of St. Louis, Mo., and vincinity, in meeting assembled on this 29th day of December, 1918, at the Greek Church of St. Nicholas, St. Louis and Garrison Avenues, have unanimously adopted the following resolution:

Whereas the world war that cost humanity an untold sacrifice and suffering has come to an end, thanks to the valor and heroism of the combined forces of the free peoples of the world; and

Whereas the leaders and representatives of the allied powers are about to assemble in peace conference at Versailles, France, to permanently decide the future peace, freedom, and happiness of the world; and

Whereas the heads of the allied Governments have declared that the war has been fought to abolish all arbitrary and autocratic powers and to secure the absolute freedom and justice for all the nations and peoples, strong and weak, upon the foundation as expressed by our illustrious President Woodrow Wilson, "The reign of law based upon the consent of the governed, sustained by the organized opinion of mankind": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we request very respectfully that the peace delegates of the allied powers extend the ideals and principles of freedom and self-determination to the unredeemed Hellenism, inhabiting the northern Epirus, all of Thrace, including the Grecian metropolis Constantinople, the northern, western, and southern coast of Asia Minor, and all the islands of the Archipelago or Ægean Sea, including the Dodecanese, held by Italy since 1910, and Cyprus, held by England. These territories are either entirely inhabited by Greeks, or the Greek race predominates over all the other inhabitants. Historically, geographically, and ethnologically the rights of Hellenism is undisputable. These peoples have originally occupied and built the above districts, and for 2,518 years have heroically defended civilization and Christianity, which they themselves established, and saved more than once the western civilization from Asiatic rule. They have suffered more than any other race in the hands of the unspeakable Turk, and certainly more than any other are entitled to be helped to rid the black slavery and servitude imposed upon them by barbarians, and be permitted to reunite with their mother country—Greece—from which they have been forcibly torn away, while defending the ideals and principles for which the present democracies of the world united to preserve; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to our noble President Woodrow Wilson, the United States Senate, the Governments of Great Britain, France, and Italy, and to the true leader of all Hellenism, Eleutherious Venizelos.

GUS. V. R. MÉCHIN,
Chairman.
JOSEPH CONSTAND,
Secretary.

DEMOBILIZATION OF AMERICAN TROOPS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I present a resolution adopted by the Huron Rotary Club, of South Dakota, on the subject of demobilization, a subject which is very important to everyone, I think, at this time, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HURON ROTARY CLUB,
Huron, S. Dak., January 11, 1919.

Hon. EDWIN S. JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am inclosing herewith copy of a resolution passed by the Rotary Club of Huron at their meeting January 8, 1919.

This resolution is the outcome of discussion on the matter of demobilization. Reports from the fathers of these young men in France and in cantonments in the United States show a condition that is demoralizing to these young men. Now that the armistice has been signed those who are so badly needed at home should be returned as soon as possible.

Very truly, yours, W. H. MAUL, Secretary.

Whereas it is now two months since the armistice was signed and it is manifest that no public good can be promoted by longer keeping our soldiers in camps and cantonments in the United States; and

Whereas it is also manifest that only a comparatively small portion of the American Expeditionary Forces is needed in Europe as an army of occupation; and

Whereas a vast number of men are held in idleness in various places in France and in cantonments in the United States who should be at once returned to their homes, where they are sorely needed in all the various fields of employment or where they should resume their studies in schools and colleges; and

Whereas the conditions that necessarily followed the taking away from these noble young men of the incentive to give their lives, if necessary, to win the war are those of relaxation, weakening of morale, and idleness, which tends to demoralization; and

Whereas thousands of these young soldiers are in foreign lands, where there is a most deplorable disorganization of the mail service, and they have been unable to receive news from their homes for months; and

Whereas in this community, which is fairly representative of the situation generally in the country, 16 boiler makers and machinists, 15 agents and telegraphers are imperatively needed by the local division of the Chicago & North Western Railway Co. at Huron and can only be secured by a return of soldiers, while every bank and business house and trade in this city is similarly in need of men, one dealer needing 10, another 8, another 6, and so on down the line; and it is the same in the country on the farms; and

Whereas tremendous demands are daily made by parents and employers for the release and return of men from the Army; and

Whereas the lack of men in all useful pursuits is both appalling and apparent, and that by reason of the unnecessary detention of men in the cantonments and camps of this country successful agriculture is threatened, commercial activities are paralyzed, manufacture and industries are handicapped, and all useful and peaceful pursuits suffer, and the situation can only be relieved by the immediate discharge from the Army of all men in the camps in this country.

We urge upon Congress such action as may be necessary to bring about the immediate demobilization, and we demand such congressional investigation necessary to hasten the discharge of every man under arms not absolutely needed in completing the demobilization of men from overseas as rapidly as they can safely be returned to this country.

Rotary Club of Huron, S. Dak.: John Longstaff, president; W. H. Maul, secretary; R. E. Cone, banker; H. E. Dickinson, superintendent Chicago & North Western Railway Co.; J. C. Dexter, dry goods; D. G. Medbery, mayor; Paul Braden, train dispatcher; H. A. Perriton, drug store; W. F. R. Whorton, dentist; J. H. Foasberg, laundry; Coe I. Crawford, lawyer and lecturer; C. W. McIlvaine, secretary South Dakota State Board of Agriculture; B. E. Beach, president Dakota Savings & Loan Co.; George C. Fullenweider, president National Bank of Huron; A. H. Dodsley, manager oil company; F. C. W. Kuehn, architect; E. W. Pigion, clergyman; George H. Costain, music dealer; I. A. Churchill, lawyer; A. M. Urquhart, automobiles; A. K. Gardner, lawyer; W. C. Gagnon, wholesale candy; J. M. Morin, wholesale groceries.

EXTENSION OF FARM-LOAN ACT TO PORTO RICO.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I present a petition from the Farmers' League of San Juan, P. R., asking for the extension of the farm-loan act to that Territory. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred, as follows:

Mr. FLETCHER submitted seven amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact that immediately after the morning business to-morrow I hope to bring before the Senate the bill with reference to judicial salaries and retirement. I mention my intention publicly because there are a number of Senators who have expressed a desire to be present when the bill is considered.

RESOURCES OF ARIZONA.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I observe in a widely circulated and remarkably influential magazine, Collier's National Weekly, an editorial entitled "Prearranged pioneering." I am surprised that the editor of this high-class publication should have made such a sarcastic reference to the State of Arizona as he has done in this editorial. I ask that the article be read. It appeared on Saturday, January 14, 1919.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

PREARRANGED PIONEERING.

"Everyone seems to be entitled to at least one suggestion as to what is to be done with the returning soldier. Everyone, that is, except the returning soldier himself.

"'I know just the thing,' says a solicitous official. 'The arid lands of the West! Our veterans can reclaim them.'

"'The swamps of Florida leave much to be desired as homestead land,' suggests another. 'They would keep any number of men busy draining and shoveling for years to come.'

"This leads to a train of similarly benevolent propositions, involving the working over of various undeveloped sections of the country, with an eye to keeping the unemployed veteran busy. But what about the veteran? He has not yet been quoted for publication on this 'arid-land' question. Presumably when he left this country a few months ago he was a normal American with a normal American's preconceived notions of what constitutes a good time. It is safe to assume that reclaiming arid lands has not been on his list of things that he wanted to do when first he reached home. What, therefore, will be his emotions on being greeted by his local reconstruction committee with this message: 'Welcome home, our hero! Your old job is gone, but we have the jolliest little bit of desert in Arizona which the Government will grant to you, and on which you can raise a practically unlimited family and perhaps a radish or two in time. Go West, young man; go West!'

"Life in God's great outdoors is doubtless a wonderful thing, and we have been led to believe that the thrill of the pioneer is a reward in itself; yet there ought to be at least an alternative reward for those returning soldiers who have benefited so little by military training as still to hanker after the effete life in the congested but congenial centers of human life."

Mr. ASHURST. I present a paper by one HENRY F. ASHURST, entitled "Arizona, the Old New State, Rich in Scenic Grandeur, Romance, History, and Natural Resources." I ask that it be included in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS. In view of the absence of the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], who objects to everything being printed in the RECORD except spoken words, I simply suggest that the Senator from Arizona seems to be taking advantage of that fact.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARIZONA, THE OLD NEW STATE, RICH IN SCENIC GRANDEUR, ROMANCE, HISTORY, AND NATURAL RESOURCES.

[By Senator HENRY F. ASHURST.]

Arizona was a populous land before the Pyramids were built. Years before Romulus and Remus were suckled, ancient Arizona peoples builded cities, not wholly lacking in grandeur. These peoples of antiquity wove and spun cotton and flax into gaudy tapestries; they melted gold and silver, from Arizona's hills, into chieftains' ornaments and queens' girdles, before Cæsar's shouting legions and laureled ensigns brought tribute back to Rome.

Centuries before the Knickerbocker set foot on Manhattan Island, their engineers watered Arizona's fertile sands from canals and reservoirs finished with hard linings of tamped or burnt clay, which in some degree possessed the endurance of our modern concrete. The origin of this people is unknown, enwrapped in the mists of antiquity. Nothing has been found of sufficient distinctiveness to enable us to do more than speculate and form ingenious theories as to whence they came, how long they enjoyed their tolerable civilization, and whither and why they went.

The Pima Indians reported to Padre Quino in 1698 that the Casa-Grande ruins were in the same condition at least 300 years before, which seemed to be as far back as the Pima tradition ran.

Whether these ancient peoples perished, migrated into Mexico, or broke up into the numerous tribes of aborigines still inhabiting the State is a matter of speculation.

Obscure and meager is that portion of our annals where we must seek for the meaning and derivation of the name "Arizona." According to bulletin 613, "Guidebook of the Western States," issued by the Department of the Interior in 1915, the word "Arizona" is taken from the Papago language, in which it is said to signify "place of small springs." According to the Encyclopedia of Names, the word is said to be "a corruption of Pima or Papago, 'Orlison,' meaning 'little creeks.'" Mowray in his "Arizona and Sonora," says: "The name is undoubtedly derived from the Aztec. In the original it is 'Arizuma' and the change is a corruption into the present word, which is accepted as Spanish. The impression among those who have been curious enough to investigate is that it signifies 'silver-bearing.'"

EARLY SPANISH EXPLORATIONS.

The first Caucasians to enter Arizona were two friars, Juan de la Asunsion and Pedro Nedal, who came in 1538. Fra Marcos de Niza, a Franciscan friar, and his party, entered in 1539 and journeyed to the source of the San Pedro River. History reveals nothing more fascinating than the annals of the "conquistadores" who represented Castillian pride and power—Ponce de Leon, Cortez, Pizarro, De Soto, Coronado, and their comrades, who flourished in the sixteenth century and made their grand tours over the western hemisphere impelled by a thirst for adventure and imbued with a contempt for danger.

Francisco Vasquez de Coronado, a native of Salamanca, Spain, of noble descent, who had attained distinction as a soldier and statesman, entered Arizona at the head of his command in 1540 and wandered for years in search of the gems and gold of the mythical seven cities of Cibola. Coronado's vagrant rambles yielded him no pecuniary profit, but he reported to his sovereign that in his explorations he was as richly rewarded as if he had found the legendary cities and Quivera's phantom towers.

Hernando de Alarcon sailed from Acapulco in May, 1540, to explore the region north of New Spain and reached the head of the Gulf of California, then known as the Sea of Cortez. He reported that he "found a mighty river that ran with so great a fury that we could hardly sail against it." There began the acquaintance of Europeans with the Colorado River, the "Nile of the West."

The Colorado River, which forms the western boundary line of the State, has the energy to drive practically unnumbered industrial enterprises, and if its waters were scientifically conserved they would irrigate lands sufficient to support nearly 2,000,000 persons. This river annually discharges 360,000,000 tons of fertilizing material. The wealth, population, produce, and tradition of the land of the Pharaohs could easily be reproduced in the valley of this river.

SPANISH MISSIONARIES AND MISSIONS.

Father Quino, subsequently known as "the great apostle to the Pima Indians," established the first mission in Arizona. He was a native of Trent, in the Austrian Tyrol, and died about the year 1710 after 26 years of missionary work in Arizona and in Sonora, Mexico.

The Mission of San Xavier del Bac, near the city of Tucson, known as a "rancheria" in the seventeenth century, and as a mission since 1720, is the oldest mission in Arizona or California which has not fallen into partial decay. It stands a monument to the zeal, industry, and architectural skill of the early missionaries.

AMERICAN INVASION.

The leaders of the American invasion were Kit Carson, the great scout and trapper; Sylvester Pattie and his son; Felix Aubrey; Lieut. Zebulon M. Pike; Bill Williams; R. W. Hardy; Jedediah Smith; Pauline Weaver; Gen. John C. Fremont, Senator from California, candidate for President and governor of Arizona; Brig. Gen. Stephen W. Kearny, commander of the Army of the West; and Col. Alexander W. Doniphan, the versatile lawyer and valorous soldier from Clay County, Mo.

In 1850 the first steamboat, the stern-wheeler Yuma, entered the Colorado River to the amazement of the Indians, who fled in terror.

In 1858 Lieut. Ives, of the Engineer Corps of the Army, with the little steamer Explorer, ascended the Colorado River as far as the lower end of Black Canyon.

The northern line of the Mexican Republic constitutes the southern boundary of the State. Physically considered, the State consists of series of wide plateaus, having a mean elevation of 1,500 feet on the southeast and up to 6,000 feet above sea level on the north. These plateaus are riven in all directions by vast gorges and great canyons of remarkable grandeur cut by the rivers which long ago eroded their way through. Mountain ranges and numerous high peaks greatly diversify the prospect. In no other place is nature more clearly caught in the act of world making than in the physical character of the larger portion of the State.

The climate of the State is varied, ranging from north-temperate winter in the mountains to isothermal heat in the tropical levels in the south-center. Infectious pulmonary afflictions never originate in the State. Health seekers are therefore very numerous. The glaring sunlight and ozone-laden atmosphere are said to be specifics for all tubercular troubles in the primary stages. The humidity is less than in any other State except Nevada, the rainy season being confined almost wholly to July and August. The rainfall is at times almost tropical in its excessiveness and rapidity of precipitation.

The population, exclusive of tribal Indians, is about 410,000. Of its 72,000,000 acres, only about 8,000,000 are privately owned, the remainder being public land, Indian reservations, and national forests.

The Territory, as originally created, in 1863, embraced 120,912 square miles, but its area was afterwards reduced by Congress to 113,956 square miles.

Obviously there can not be narrated in this paper even a portion of the exalted heroism of the early pioneers in their contests with ferocious Indians, or their fortitude and sagacity in traversing and settling uncharted stretches of desert, whose raw and ruthless sun came down as a pitiless flail and where life was in constant peril from lurking savages or from a miscalculation as to the distance to or location of the next "watering place."

The process of evoluting a vast, unknown domain into a prosperous State is a grim game.

Prior to the entry of the Southern Pacific Railroad into the Territory in 1879 merchandise and supplies were brought to Yuma by steamboat and thence distributed by freight teams to the various settlements. Six months were frequently required to transport a consignment of goods from San Francisco to the interior of the Territory.

Two transcontinental railway lines, the Santa Fe and the Southern Pacific, now cross the State. These pulsating arteries of commerce follow the general course of historic trails and stage roads.

The Santa Fe Railroad follows the general course of the "Old Santa Fe Trail," while the Southern Pacific follows the once busy Butterfield stage line. Over the Butterfield route, established in 1858, was run a triweekly stage for a distance of 2,535 miles, traversing a land infested by Indian tribes of unspeakable brutality. Twenty-four days were required to cover the distance between St. Louis and San Francisco. The shortest period of time in which the mail was ever carried was 21 days and 23 hours. The journey was difficult and filled with peril. The cost of passage per person was $150, exclusive of meals. The route was abandoned in 1861 on account of the inveterate hostility of the Indians and the outbreak of the Civil War. The Butterfield stage line, although the longest, most important, and most romantic, was not the first to cross Arizona. The first stage line established was in 1857 and extended from San Antonio, Tex., on the east, to San Diego, Cal., on the west.

The Santa Fe trail, established in 1822, first ran from the Missouri settlements to Santa Fe, N. Mex., was later extended to the Pacific Ocean, and followed largely the same stretches of country explored by the first detail of European civilization on its way to the Grand Canyon in 1541. It in turn passes the Petrified Forest, the logs of which are the remains of trees that grew in Triassic time. The trees were of several kinds, most of them being related to the Norfolk Island pines. A small amount of iron oxide is distributed through the logs, which gives them their beautiful yellow, brown, and red tints. This old trail also passes near the Hopi villages, where may be seen to this day the most remarkable indigenous religious rite in the Western World—the snake dance; it passes the Painted Desert, and crosses and recrosses the path where walked the steps of Fray Garces, who, in 1776, wandered along the brink of the Grand Canyon the while the Liberty Bell in Philadelphia was proclaiming freedom.

The city of Tucson, probably the oldest city in the United States, has undergone strange mutations and various conditions of occupancy, to wit: An Indian pueblo; mission for Spanish priests; presidio for Spanish soldiers; rendezvous for Mexican troops; capital of the Confederate Territory of Arizona and later capital of the Union Territory. Tucson was the first and only walled city in the United States. This wall existed for about 150 years and was built in the form of a square. The wall rose to a height of about 5 feet above the roofs of the houses. A tower guarded each corner and there were two entrances, defended by immense doors of heavy timbers, invariably closed at night. Some of the old wall was later used in the construction of modern buildings.

In December, 1846, Lieut. Col. St. George Cooke, commanding the Mormon battalion, composed of 500 courageous Mormon soldiers who were marching to the assistance of Gen. Stephen Kearny, then hard pressed by the Mexicans in California, issued the following order:

HEADQUARTERS MORMON BATTALION,
CAMP ON THE SAN PEDRO,
December 13, 1846.

Thus far on our course we have followed the guides furnished us by the general (Kearny). These guides now point to Tucson, a garrisoned town, as our road, and assert that any other course is a hundred miles out of the way and over a trackless wilderness of mountains, rivers, and hills. We will march then to Tucson. We came not to make war on Sonora, and less still to destroy an important outpost of defense against Indians; but we will take the straight road before us and overcome all resistance. But shall I remind you that the American soldier ever shows justice and kindness to the unarmed and unresisting? The property of individuals you will hold sacred. The people of Sonora are not our enemies.

By order of Lieut. Col. Cooke.

(Signed) P. C. MERRILL, Adjutant.

Reaching Tucson the next day, the command passed through the gate into the walled city, whereupon Col. Cooke raised the American flag and then made a short speech in which he stated that no one would be harmed, as his troops would not in any way interfere with the private property and civil rights of the citizens.

To the unsophisticated "tenderfoot," the deserts of Arizona present nothing attractive, whereas a familiarity with them reveals that they bear upon their bosoms, flora of gorgeous beauty. Much has been written of the "arboreal Arizona deserts," for these deserts bloom with flowers. The prevailing hue of the desert is not monotonous; for there are ever-changing color-tones of the sky and far-away mountain peaks that form the rim of your world. The rich purple tones in the distant hills, the pearl gray touches, and the deep translucent azures in the arching heavens make up myriad glints of light and color that may not be set upon canvas.

Within the State is the largest area of recent volcanic action to be found on the continent, "recent" being employed in its geological sense. In the State is the largest and most interesting cave dwelling; the most extensive "pinus ponderosa" forest in the United States, and in the forest are hundreds of small parks—bowl-like gems of exquisite scenery.

Maj. J. W. Powell, whose labors as an explorer and geologist were of incalculable value to the American people, left a rich legacy by his early explorations of the Grand Canyon. Scarcely less fearless and prominent were the subsequent journeys and explorations through the canyon made by Lieut. Wheeler in 1871, Mr. R. B. Stanton in 1890, and the Kolb brothers in 1912.

The total number of Indians maintaining tribal relations in the State is about 44,000. The Navajo (one of the boldest and most sagacious of tribes) is domiciled in northeastern Arizona. The Navajos were wily foes and their raids and depredations were usually victorious. After the acquisition of the great Southwest by the United States, the Navajo warriors killed many citizens. Several attempts were made to subdue the Navajo, but none succeeded until 1863, when Col. Kit Carson drove them into New Mexico, where they were held as prisoners until 1867, when they were permitted to return to their old haunts in Arizona, where a reservation covering more than 9,000,000 acres was apportioned to them. Since that time they have been peaceful and in some ways prosperous. The Navajo was not mentioned by travelers prior to 1629 and apparently began as a small offshoot of the Apaches. They call themselves Dinneh, "the people." The Spaniards called them, "Apaches de Navajo," from Navahu, the name of an old Tigua pueblo. The women weave the famous Navajo blankets, which bring them nearly $500,000 a year, and men and boys tend their sheep and goats and raise a few crops.

Despite their history as predatory savages, the Navajo are in general jovial, intelligent, and, as Indians go, industrious and capable. They have an ample vocabulary, a complex grammar, an elaborate religious system, and hundreds of songs.

Arizona is the premier copper mining State; it produces annually one-third of the copper output of the United States, being about one-sixth of the entire world output. The value of the State's copper production for the year 1918 was over $200,000,000, while the annual output of gold, silver, lead, and zinc aggregated $13,000,000.

The total value of crops raised in Arizona for the agricultural year of 1918 is $36,000,000, and of this crop long-staple cotton furnished a value of $14,000,000.

That portion of Arizona, exclusive of the Gadsden purchase, was formally ceded by Mexico to the United States in 1848 by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

The Gadsden purchase, consummated in 1854, added 24,940 square miles to the Territory's domain.

Immediately after the Gadsden purchase, increasing numbers of Americans, from the stream of immigrants to California, began to make permanent homes in the Territory. These pioneers possessed the vision and energy of State builders and the spirit of Crusaders. As early as 1856 the settlers in Arizona petitioned Congress for separation from New Mexico and for the establishment of a Territorial government. In December, 1859, Senator Jefferson Davis introduced a bill to create a temporary government for the Territory of Arizona. Through the vicissitudes of government, Arizona was organized as a Territory by the Congress of the Confederate States a year before the Congress of the United States erected the Union Territory, and was occupied during the Civil War by a force of Confederates from Texas, who were driven out by the Federal troops entering from California in 1863.

The civil government of the Union Territory was formally set up at Navajo Springs in 1863; hence the capital may be said to have been once at Navajo Springs. It was at Prescott from 1863 to 1867; at Tucson from 1867 to 1877; again at Prescott from 1877 to 1889, when it was permanently located at Phoenix. Almost immediately upon the erection of the Territory the question of statehood was agitated. Such a bold and dominant vanguard of American pioneers would not long permit their new home to remain in a posture of vassalage and dependency. Moreover, the Territorial government was set up by men of large ability and high ambition. The first Delegate to Congress, Charles D. Poston, born in Hardin County, Ky., in 1825, was a brilliant orator and charming raconteur.

The first man inducted into the office of governor was John Noble Goodwin, born in South Berwick, Me., in 1824, a graduate of Dartmouth College. Mr. Goodwin was elected to the Thirty-seventh Congress from the State of Maine. His state papers, and especially his messages to the Territorial legislature, evince a high order of patriotism and scholarship. After his service as governor he was Delegate to Congress from the Territory.

The first secretary of state was the classically educated Richard Cunningham McCormick, born in New York City in 1832. He was with the Army of the Potomac as a correspondent of the New York Evening Post in 1861 and 1862; was secretary of the Territory, governor, and in the Forty-first, Forty-second, and Forty-third Congresses, was Delegate; appointed minister to Brazil in 1877, but declined; appointed minister to Mexico in 1879, but declined; elected as a Republican from New York to the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The efforts of the people of the Territory to obtain statehood have at times been marked by disagreement between the people of the Territory and the Federal Government. A constitution was framed in 1891, and undoubtedly Arizona would have been admitted into the Union at that time, except that the Arizonians were unwilling to eliminate from their proposed State constitution a provision that silver and gold should be a standard of legal tender.

In 1903 statehood was defeated by a filibuster led by the able Senator Beveridge, of Indiana, who with other Senators, "talked to death" what was known as the omnibus statehood bill, providing separate statehoods for Arizona and New Mexico. In the following Congress, Senator Beveridge obtained committee approval in both Houses for his plan of uniting Oklahoma and Indian Territory as one State and Arizona and New Mexico as another. The bill passed the House and came to the Senate, where Senator Joseph Benson Foraker, of Ohio, encouraged and aided by the then Delegate from Arizona, MARCUS A. SMITH, now United States Senator, the wisest and most experienced statesman of the Southwest, conducted a determined contest with Senator Beveridge. The Beveridge bill passed the Senate with the "Foraker amendment," which provided that the vote of Arizona and New Mexico, counted separately, should determine whether they were to be admitted as one State. Under this amendment Arizona found refuge, and at the elections in 1906, by a large majority, refused to link her destiny with another community.

An enabling act authorizing the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as separate States was passed by Congress and approved by President Taft on June 20, 1910. The constitutional convention assembled in October of that year, and after a session of 60 days framed a constitution, which was ratified in February of the succeeding year by nearly four-fifths majority of those voting.

Congress by joint resolution of August 21, 1911, agreed to admit Arizona if the judicial recall provision were eliminated from the proposed constitution, which was done by the voters at the general elections held in the following December.

On February 14, 1912, President Taft issued his proclamation declaring Arizona admitted as a State, and on the same day George W. P. Hunt, president of the constitutional convention, was inducted into the office of governor.

The laws of the State represent an enlightened policy, and have mitigated, if not wholly removed, some of the worst evils that most balefully afflict society.

As a State, Arizona united the energy of youth with the wisdom of experience, and accomplished that rare feat in reforms of fusing progress with stability. The birth of a sovereign State and its entry into the American Union is an important and majestic event. Under our Federal system it is the most beautiful and symmetrical creation of political authority known to men. Although at times it seems that the States are being gradually weakened or absorbed by the Federal Government, no American should forget that the sovereignty of statehood is the highest and most beneficent plan which human wisdom can devise.

Do you seek the land of romance! Go to Arizona.

Would you engage in stock raising! There are grown the wool and hides that clothe a Nation and the mutton and beef that sustain it. Hydroelectric power! There are strategic points where may be generated sufficient hydroelectric power to turn all the wheels and propel all the trains requisite to carry the commerce of the entire southwest.

Von Humboldt called Arizona the "treasure vault of the Americas," over 100 years ago. The State is nature's alembic, where the base metals are transmuted into gold. She is El Dorado! Remain there and shout "Eureka!" for into her hills and caverns nature has poured more mineral wealth than Ophir had to burden the fleets of Solomon.

Scenic grandeur! The deep alcoves, the green and gray crags, the vermilion gleams and roseate hues of the Apache trail, open the door to regions of beauty and glory.

Let Music Mountain, with its regularity of strata and its singular erosive work, point you to a sheet of music carved on the face of the mountain by the Great Composer, through the agencies of wind and water.

The Painted Desert casts its bewitching spell upon you and you perceive the "sea of jasper;" you seem to descry fortifications with flags flying on their ramparts, walled towers on conical hills amidst an admixture of light and shade beneath a vault of flawless turquoise blue.

Only a facile pen and not this dull one may be dipped deep enough into the ink of temerity to attempt a description of the colonnades, pyramids, fluted pilasters, swelling domes, sculptured architraves, mosques, minarets, and inverted temples in that 13-mile-wide gash, the Grand Canyon.

A prose-poet of no contemptible order will find himself hard pressed, even tamely, to describe the bold escarpments, sheer cliffs and isolated mesas, within that wondrous canyon, between whose walls there tumbles and rolls and boils the rapid and forbidding Colorado River.

Would you follow that noble vocation by which the multitudes of the earth are nourished, agriculture? Would you become a producer? Consider then that the fertile sands and salubrious climate of Arizona produce the Tunis date, the Egyptian long staple cotton, the orange, the olive, the lemon, the Louisiana sugar cane, the Michigan sugar beet, the Canadian strawberry, the Kalamazoo celery, the California cantaloupe, the French asparagus, and all the fruits and grains and flowers. And lest the rainy season might not synchronize with the "heated spell" there have been built irrigation projects so big and yet so simple, so practical and yet so ideal that they charm the imagination with their wizardry the while they pour their "living waters" out upon the rich alluvial soils.

Do you seek health? Arizona is a dreamful tranquillity, which soothes the throbbing nerve of pain. She blows a bracing, healing air that reddens the bloodless lip and paints the rose upon the invalid's pallid cheek. And the citizens! They are of active enterprise and unbending courage. They are disciples of industry, therefore apostles of success who know that all independence, competence, and all livable conditions of life come only from constant striving and long-sustained effort. The wealth and beauty of enterprise, the public order, justice, and progress that have been set up in Arizona during the past 30 years make the lamp of Aladdin and the purse of Fortunatus appear tame and commonplace by comparison. Her people, testifying to the eternal and supreme truth of Christianity as a solid foundation for civilization, have built a State which will give good government to the people and strength to the Union so long as men love liberty. Fair dealing, moderation, industry, sobriety, frugality, freedom from bigotry, are the great virtues, and they who visit these shrines never come away empty handed. These virtues build a State.

Hail the giant—the old-new State! Her past is romantic; her present is radiant. Those who are banished from her borders by caprice or misfortune are irresistably recalled by the splashing splendors of her noonday sun; her sunsets that are wedges of flaming gold, and her cloudless nights lit with eternal stars, which, bright and clear, bespangle the serene and silent arch above.

PEACE POLICIES.

Mr. FRANCE. I offer a resolution and ask to have it read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution (S. Res. 412) was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas on the 11th day of November, 1918, the President of the United States announced the signing of an armistice between the United States and the central powers, against which this Nation had been at war, the President at that time declaring "the war thus comes to an end"; and

Whereas it has not as yet come to the knowledge of the Senate of the United States that peace negotiations have been entered into with the enemy; and

Whereas the keeping for any length of time of an American Army upon European soil is undesirable and a cause of vast expense and of deep anxiety to the American people; and

Whereas profound unrest among the people of many nations and violent revolutions in several countries, which spirit of unrest and revolution are augmented by the hardships resulting from the maintenance of armies of occupation and by that underproduction throughout the world of the necessities and commodities of life, which has resulted from the long withholding of many millions of men from productive industry, must be a cause for deep concern on the part of the several Governments: Therefore be it

Resolved,

First. That the Senate, as part of the treaty-making power of the Government, does hereby consent to and most earnestly advise that at the very earliest possible moment negotiations be entered into with the enemy looking to the establishment of a just peace and that all subsidiary questions, which might delay the establishment of such a just peace between the nations, without which peace national stability is everywhere endangered, may be postponed for a later discussion at an international conference.

Second. That the Senate, as part of the treaty-making power of the Government, does hereby consent to and most earnestly advise that at the earliest possible moment consistent with the safety of this Nation American troops be returned from Europe; and, further, that after the establishment of peace the President call upon the Governments of North and South America to appoint two delegates each to an international conference, to be held at some suitable time and place, to consider plans for the closer cooperation of these Governments in promoting justice, progress, and friendship among and within the said countries of the Western Continent; and, further, that the President also, at some time subsequent to this conference of the American Republics, call upon all the nations to appoint delegates to another international conference, to be held at some suitable time and place, to discuss and consider plans for the promotion of justice, progress, and friendship among and within the nations of the world, such conference to particularly discuss and consider plans for the removal, so far as may be, of the economic and social causes of war, and to this end particularly give attention to—

1. The congestion of population of some nations.
2. The underpopulation of other nations.
3. The unregulated competition between the more populous and industrial countries for the raw products and trade of the less populous and agricultural ones.
4. The exploitation of the weaker and the less advanced by the stronger and more highly organized nations.
5. A larger self-determination of peoples and nations.
6. The possibility of the cooperation of the more advanced nations for the improvement of the conditions of the backward countries, particularly those of Africa and parts of Asia, by the formulation of plans for the reclamation of waste lands, for the utilization of natural resources, including water powers, for wise colonization, for education, and for the spread of civilization in the interest of those countries and of the world.
7. The best means for the wider and more rapid extension of education and civilization throughout the world, looking to the ultimate elimination of national, racial, and religious antagonisms.
8. The establishment of constitutional republics or of governments of such uniformity throughout the world as would make for that national stability upon which could be based a permanent international order.
9. The elimination of all causes of national enmities and the establishment of friendship and justice between the nations, with a view to the ultimate establishment of a league of nations or world federation of republics for the purpose of promoting the cause of progress and of peace throughout the earth.

CALENDAR MONDAY.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Senate proceeded yesterday with its usual custom of disregarding Calendar Monday. The Vice President called attention to the fact that Calendar Monday had not been observed since the rule providing for it was adopted. I wish to give notice that hereafter on Calendar Monday I shall object to any variation whatever from the regular order to the end that Calendar Monday may be observed. I give this notice now in order that Senators may be fully advised.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 13708. An act providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, whatever there may be of virtue or of vice, of strength, or of weakness in the proposition of a league of nations, whether it shall prevail or whether it shall fail, I think it profitable to discuss the problem. Certainly no subject of such moment should be permitted to pass into practical form without the most thorough consideration and discussion upon the part not only of those in public place but of and by private citizens.

There are, it seems, as many different kinds of leagues of nations as there are advocates. But I think it may be fairly said that all are but modifications of two fundamental types or plans. The first is a league which would organize the moral forces of the world. The second is a league which would organize the military forces of the world. The former depends for its effect upon public opinion and the power of ideas. The second rests ultimately, if not primarily, upon force, upon repression. The former is indicated in President Wilson's speeches in France and Italy. The second has its most distinguished and industrious advocate in ex-President Taft.

I do not at this time discuss the first plan. I recognize in government and among men the power of public opinion. We shall watch with interest the development of the machinery by which it is to be made effective for the settlement of concrete questions and particularly difficulties in international affairs. It is upon the second plan that I wish to submit some observations, for peace by repression may be infinitely worse than war. It may not be a peace of justice or of liberty at all. It may be the same kind of a peace that Germany contemplated for all the world in case her scheme had ripened into success. It was frustrated, however, by the liberty-loving people of the free nations, who thought there were some things dearer than peace, and among them the right to live our own lives in our own way.

At the time that the League to Enforce Peace was first organized it was apparent to those who gave it consideration that it must rest ultimately upon force, upon the principle of repression. But the advocates of this particular league were very slow to admit to the public that that was the true construction to be placed upon their program. It was some time before it was conceded that force would have any particular part in the maintenance and execution of the objects and purposes of this league. It was argued that it might ultimately be relied upon, but that it would be seldom used. We have now arrived at that stage of the discussion when its proponents concede that the distinguishing feature of this league over all others is that it depends upon force and that its fundamental principle is that of repression; that it can only be maintained by the organization of the military power of the great nations, to be used whenever those powers shall deem it proper.

Naturally, the first question that one would ask would be, "How are you going to raise your Army to sustain this vast military program or this league based upon force?" Would the citizens of the United States volunteer to enter the Army for the purpose, for instance, of settling difficulties in the Balkans? Would the American boys leave their homes or the farms or the factories for the purpose of taking part in the adjustment of a controversy between Japan and Russia over Manchuria? How are you to have a sufficient force in a free nation with which to maintain the program outlined by this league? After some delay, the ex-President was frank enough to say precisely how it was expected to raise and maintain a sufficient Army to support a league to enforce peace. I call attention to this because it is one of the practical features now indicated in the workings of this program; it is one of the things which come home direct to the citizen, and which enable him to see precisely what his duties and obligations are to be if this particular principle should be incorporated in the league of nations. We are to have conscription in time of peace.

We yielded, Mr. President, to the principle of conscription in the great emergency through which we have just passed, but it is certainly of extraordinary moment to the people of this country to have presented to them the question of conscription in time of peace in order to secure a force with which to sustain the proposed league. In a speech made in New York some time ago in advocacy of the league of nations, the ex-President said:

> Very little service of any kind has been exacted from the great body of the people. Conscription is needed to discipline our native young men and to teach them respect for authority. It is needed to teach our millions of newly created citizens loyalty. Congress should enact a conscription law making provision not only for the present but for the future after the war shall end.

The ex-President should be commended for his candor. It was clear from the beginning that must be the true basis, and the only basis, upon which a league to enforce peace, based upon the principle of force, could ever be maintained. We will never be able to call into activity or into service a sufficient force from the American homes to do our part in a league of nations to settle the controversies of Europe and of Asia by means of military power except by fastening conscription upon the American people. At a time when other governments, which have had experience with conscription, are pledging the people that it shall be abrogated and eliminated from their system this Republic is to have it made permanent. While others are trying to get away from it the league to enforce peace would require that we ingraft it upon our system as an abiding principle. Lloyd George and others who have spoken upon the subject have said that it shall not only be eliminated but that it shall be forgotten as a precedent. The league to enforce peace states that the basis upon which it expects to operate is that of inaugurating this principle even in time of peace. That is the practical, and the first practical, proposition with which we shall have to do in the organizing of this particular form of a league. I think it well to read a paragraph from Mr. Lloyd George's speech about the time that he was asking the people of England for their suffrages:

On the eve of this important election which means so much to the country I wish to make it clear beyond all doubt that I stand for the abolition of conscript armies in all lands. Without that the peace conference would be a failure and a sham. These great military machines are responsible for the agony the world has passed through, and it would be a poor ending to any peace conference that allowed them to continue.

That which the premier of England looks upon as the basis of militarism and the exclusion of which is essential to the peace of the world, the ex-President regards as indispensable to the successful operation of a league to enforce peace. Both are correct, and, peculiarly enough, both are for a league of nations.

We pass on to another feature of this program of a league to enforce peace. We are not only to have an army based upon conscription but we are to have the largest navy in the world. Admiral Badger, appearing before the Committee on Naval Affairs, outlined the Navy we should have, and frankly stated the objects and the purposes for which it was being built. I trespass upon the patience of the Senate long enough to read a paragraph or two from the admiral's testimony. On page 495 of the hearings he gives a list of the battleships, battle cruisers, scouts, and so forth, which are to make up the largest navy in the world, as follows:

Battleships	12
Battle cruisers	16
Scouts	30
Destroyers	108
Submarines:
Fleet	21
S type	146
Antisubmarine	24
Mine laying	42
Mine sweepers	284
Destroyer tenders	12
Submarine tenders	6
Airplane carriers	6
Patrol vessels	376
Aircraft:
Large seaplanes	1,704
Dirigibles	156
Kite balloons	544
Rigid airships	24

In his testimony he says:

Navies must be the principal support of a league of nations, and the United States, from its wealth, influence, and power, will be called upon to contribute a very large share of the international police force to render such a league effective.

The able Secretary of the Navy, addressing the committee a few days afterwards, among other things said:

It is desired to enter the Paris peace conference with the assurance from Congress that the American Navy would be enlarged to a size commensurate with the greatest naval power.

Why should we enter a peace conference at which no one will have a seat other than our friends and our allies with the assurance from the American Congress that we are building the biggest war machine in history? If I meet with my neighbor to settle a difficulty, announcing in advance that we are there for the purpose of arranging our difficulties upon peaceful terms and in a peaceable way, it is calculated to disturb the serenity of the gathering if I throw upon the table my loaded revolver. There is no one at the peace table, Mr. President, to whom it is necessary to say that we are preparing for war upon a gigantic scale. I have no particular objection to the game of international bluff, provided it is not too expensive for the taxpayers. Besides, the bluff might be called, and that would be the beginning of another war.

Again he states:

I may say that you can not do anything in the world which would so strengthen this country's position at the peace conference as to authorize this enlarged naval program.

I quote from a report of his testimony in the New York Times of December 31:

It is the desire of Secretary Daniels and the Navy officials to have a Navy which will be as large as that of any other country, not only for defensive purposes but for policing the world in case a league of nations to enforce peace is created at the Versailles conference.

This program is estimated to cost $600,000,000. This is the largest single naval expenditure in the history of the world, all in order that a league to enforce peace may not fail for want of respectability.

I can not understand this demand for so heavy an expenditure for warships at this particular time. The facts and the reason and the psychology of the situation, if I may use that term, are all against it. Battleships are made for war, for the purpose of fighting some one. Where is the enemy that compels this speedy and tremendous expenditure at this time? Germany is conquered and her navy subject to the disposal of her conquerors. Russia is dismembered and broken. Every one of these ships built at this time will rot upon the sea before Russia is again a factor upon the ocean. Are we then challenging or throwing doubt upon the friendship of France or of England? Japan is a powerful nation, but her relations with this people are now friendlier than they have been for a decade. In addition to that, the relation of England and Japan is amicable enough. I would favor a reasonable building program at this time, although the necessity for it is less commanding than it has been for 15 years. But to put out this extraordinary and bewildering and threatening program at this time is unnecessary to the situation, unwise as an international move, and highly unjust to the taxpayers of this country, already harried and worried with the fearful burdens of the war.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that in enumerating these formidable countries he should not overlook Bolivia and Switzerland?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know that the Senator from Idaho has stated it, but if this program is carried out it will give the United States a larger and stronger Navy than that of Great Britain at the beginning of the war, and if the ships that are now under construction are completed, it will give the United States a stronger Navy than the combined navies of the three next powers—Japan, France, and Italy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we can best realize this stupendous program by comparison. France, Russia, Germany, and England combined expended in round figures $200,000,000 upon their navies in the year 1913. This was at a time when there was a feverish, though undefined, feeling of unrest in Europe. In fact, after 1906 Germany had in a sense challenged England's sea power by her increased building program. But even so, those four great powers combined expended little more upon all their navies than we now propose to expend upon ours in the next year. After the war has come to an end, with our enemies defeated and all the great naval powers friendlier than ever before in our history, we propose to spend $600,000,000 in the next three years upon a powerful fighting machine. Is this not a direct challenge to the good faith of our allies, or does it not throw doubt upon the sincerity of our own professions? Above all, is it not a signal act of injustice to the people of this country, who have paid taxes and bought liberty bonds and saved and stinted and denied themselves in this crisis? Is the American taxpayer to have no place whatever in this program of national affairs save that of a coddled peon? Are we going on with this shameless orgy of expenditure until the people are forced to cry out with the voice of revolution against the madness that is grinding them to powder? The expenditures of this war will amount to easily thirty billions, and yet we are proposing to add billions upon billions for war purposes in time of peace.

Then there comes from the War Department a demand for the purchase of all the cantonments. These vast war utilities are to be purchased at a cost of from twelve to fifteen millions and to be maintained and kept up at a cost annually of from fifteen to twenty million dollars. These things are the first incidents or preliminary preparations of the league to enforce peace. These are the modest preparations for peace by repression, by force. While we seem to have great plans in theory, nevertheless in practice we are still apparently following the rule of kings and autocrats and that is to first frighten the people and then rob them through taxation. I call attention to these facts at this particular time for the reason that it is a program advocated by men of vast influence and of great standing in this country who have announced that they propose to hold conventions in all the large cities of the country in order that the people may understand precisely what their program is and to secure an indorsement at the hands of the people. What effect that might finally have upon the congress at Versailles I do not know, but I want, if I can in my humble way, to convey to the people the fact that the league to enforce peace does not mean disarmament, it does not mean relieving them from taxes or from the great burdens of war but of adding to them permanently and for all time to come. It is not certain that this program will bring peace, but it is morally certain that it will bring great armies and navies and crushing burdens and taxes without "stint or limit."

Now, let us see what they propose to do with that great military force when they get it. We are not left in doubt in regard to it. The principle upon which they propose to use it has been stated repeatedly. Slowly but surely the scheme unfolds.

Speaking at Baltimore, December 9, 1918, the ex-President of the United States said:

We have got to have a league with force enough to say to all those small nations: "We do not propose to let you start a conflagration that will destroy this peace that we have endured so infinitely much to bring about."

Again, at Atlantic City:

We should make a start in Russia right soon. You can not deal with the Bolsheviki in any other way than their own system. The only way to deal with those people is to kill them off.

The league to enforce peace is, therefore, according to the explicit language of its most distinguished advocate, based entirely upon the principle of repression. The only remedy which is now proposed is that of absolutely repressing any movement that does not accord with the idea of the league to enforce peace.

The whole scheme, Mr. President, is founded on force. These advocates of this particular league can find no amelioration, no remedy, save that based upon force. "Kill them off," cries the league's most distinguished exponent. While yet in the formative period, even before they have an army at their command, before they have actually tasted the power for which they hunger, the watchword is "kill them off." What will be the program when once power is lodged in their hands? "He tasted blood and felt no loathing. He tasted again and liked it well." That is the story of all individuals and of all institutions believing in or founded upon the gospel of force. If these people would enter Russia, with whom we are at peace, and slay and decimate because of internal troubles, what would they do with other nations which might from time to time have internal disturbance or revolutions? Have they not said in explicit language that "we want a force to deal with small nations when they start a conflagration." Are all conflagrations to be put out save those which meet with their approval? The fathers started a conflagration in 1776. Other peoples may start conflagrations of the same kind. India, with her countless millions, may in future years express a desire for independence and for freedom. Other subject nationalities may feel some time or other that they want their independence and freedom. What will be the doctrine of the league? They have announced it—"Kill them off."

The people have been told of the halcyon days that were to come with the league. Men would no longer make war. The crushing burdens of stupendous armaments were to be lifted. The dull, menotonous struggle of the masses bending under the weight of governmental expenditures was to have an end. But not so. We are to have a larger standing army than ever. Why? In order to support the league. We are to have the largest Navy in the world. Why? In order to support the league of peace. We are to have militarism such as Prussia only dreamed of. We are to have taxes beyond the taxes of any era or of any age. Why? In order to support the league of peace. We are to compose all the troubles and put out all the conflagrations started to destroy kingship or bureaucracy. And how are we to stop the troubles? How are we to put out the conflagrations? Why, in the same old way, nothing new about it at all. Precisely the same way and in the same method of the holy alliance—"kill them off." If the people are to be taxed and taxed, and if they rebel against the burden are to be killed off I do not see the virtue of the scheme. I confess that my vision may be somewhat blurred and I know my fancy is somewhat troubled when I see these vast equipments of war, this vast array of force—standing armies, conscription, great navies, and taxes without stint or limit—with no answer to give the people when they cry out in resistance save the cry coming down through the centuries from the lips of tyrants and despots, "kill them off."

Those who while wanting peace nevertheless have feared a league backed by a vast military power have not had long to wait to see their fears justified. They had looked into the pages of history and they feared that human nature was in all probability still the same—that arbitrary power backed by military force would resort to repression as the only means of maintaining peace. And how quick the change! They changed their shibboleth overnight. During the war the air was laden with promises for a freer and more democratic world, a less burdened people, the rights of small nations with no invidious exceptions, self-determination, open diplomacy, disarmament, and democracy. These things intoxicated the very air we breathed. Cheered by these promises the people fought and bled and died in the great cause. Mothers gave up their sons, wives their husbands, and the common people faced hunger and disease, starvation and death in the belief that they could see ahead for their children at least a freer and a less burdened world. Kings and armaments and royal tinsel and secret agreements and all the pretense and vicious practices which have weighed humanity down seemed nearing their eternal end. But scarcely had the armistice been signed until a different tone, a discouraging warning voice was heard from those in authority. A noted leader, an advocate of the league on the other side, hastened to say, "The world can not be made safe for democracy by increasing the number of democratic states." Self-determination, it was declared, could only have a most limited application. Open diplomacy has been rejected, disarmament has given way to an ambitious program for stupendous armies and navies. As for the rights of small nations, if they should start a conflagration the remedy is to kill them off. These are not the principles upon which we fought the war; and these are not the principles, either, upon which permanent peace may rest, but they are the principles which are already foreshadowed by this league based upon force.

The league to enforce peace organized just 100 years ago ran the same course. Its original protestations were upon a high plane. Its purposes were based upon the widest humanitarianism and the greatest liberty for all. It specifically declared in favor of self-determination and it pronounced in favor of open diplomacy. But when once organized and backed with power it had but one principle by which it was guided, and that was repression. When the people cried out against injustice and made a move for liberty they were suppressed by force without regard to their rights or to the justice of their cause. When the small nations of South America started a conflagration they made a move to put it out. This putting out conflagrations is a fascinating pastime. But America said no; these conflagrations are shedding a kindly light upon the homes and the hearthstones of the long repressed and they shall not be put out, neither shall those who started them be killed off. Revolution is the people's law of self-defense, and you shall not deny it to those South American people.

Senators, you can not establish peace by force, by repression. If you have any other workable scheme or plan, bring it forward, but the scheme based on force is more repulsive and destructive of human justice and human liberty and human progress than Prussianism itself. It is Prussianism extended, amplified, and denationalized. If you think you can seek out and do justice to all nations, great and small; if you think you can found an organization based upon the principles of human progress and whose decrees are enforced by public opinion; if you think you can prescribe reasonable rules for change and growth and progress; if you think you can look into the hearts of a particular people and interpret that inexplicable passion which when the appointed hour comes melts away all obstacles, rejects all restraints, and forces its way from a small to a great nation; if you think you can look upon a French revolution cursed with apparent stupidity and steeped in blood and foretell that in a hundred years those same people, disenthralled and free, will stand between civilization and organized barbarism as the French stood at the Marne; if you think you can now look upon a broken and dismembered and bleeding Russia and foretell her future or point out along what paths she will move in order that she may realize the best there is in her; if you think you can do what the living God has not been able to do, standardize the human family; if you feel you can undo what He in His inscrutable wisdom did when He planted race prejudice in the hearts and stamped color upon the faces of men, then give us your prospectus. We will be glad to look it over. We shall be infinitely happy if we find that it is workable. But if you are simply going back to the old discarded league of military power with which to put out conflagrations, to repress movements, and to kill off those who are dissatisfied and who in their madness and helplessness are striving for better things, we should reject it and denounce it as a menace to human liberty and a challenge to human progress.

Mr. President, it may not be uninteresting to call attention to some other views, foreign views, of this league to enforce peace. I think it throws some light upon it to have the construction of those who do not feel timid on account of our institutions or the possible bias or prejudice of the people against transferring their sovereign powers to a supertribunal. Mr. H. G. Wells, one of the most fascinating writers of the day, in his book entitled, "The Fourth Year," discusses the league of nations as follows:

If this phrase, "the league of free nations," is to signify anything more than a rhetorical flourish, then certain consequences follow that have to be faced now. No man can join a partnership and remain an absolutely free man. You can not bind yourself to do this and not to do that and to consult and act with your associates in certain eventualities without a loss of your sovereign freedom. People in this country and in France do not seem to be sitting up manfully to these necessary propositions.

I like the candor of the writer. He states without circumlocution that any organization of the league which will amount to anything at all must necessarily imply the surrender of sovereignty upon the part of the individual nations. We must transfer to some one the right to determine when we shall enter a war or when we shall make use of our armed forces for any particular purpose in the execution of the plans of the league. He can not conceive of an organization which would have any prestige which did not detract or subtract from some one a sovereign power which it had taken unto itself. Some one must give up that sovereign power, and the individual nations must do that. Further along in his interesting volume he says:

Firstly, then, it must be able to adjudicate upon all international disputes whatever. Its first function must clearly be that. Before a war can break out there must be the possibility of a world decision upon its rights and wrongs. The league, therefore, will have as its primary function to maintain a supreme court, whose decisions will be final, before which every sovereign power may appear as plaintiff against any other sovereign power or group of powers. * * * But in addition there is a more doubtful and delicate class of case—arising out of the discontent of patches of one race or religion in the dominions of another. How far may the supreme court of the world attend to grievances between subject and sovereign?

After having enumerated the different cases which have occurred to him—

The author is probably correct. It is likely true that the next war will not be a war between governments or between nations but between the governments and the people. I admit that the future is filled with many forebodings, but they are of internal conflicts. Those of us who believe in an orderly, regulated liberty, in a government of law, a government by the people in orderly and manly fashion, have something of a task before us. I deplore the madness and the fearful crimes of Russia, but we must find some remedy besides killing them off. I am one of those who believe that the French Revolution and the Russian Revolution, that Robespierre and Lenine, are the legitimate outgrowth and offspring of the injustice and oppression, the hideous, prolonged, and insistent cruelty of the governments which preceded. There has not been a mass movement in all history that did not have a just foundation. We might have differed wholly with the methods, we might have deplored the madness, but there was a cause for it, nevertheless, lying back. There has not been a crime committed in Russia in the last six months that had not its legitimate parent crime in the indescribable oppression of the bloody Romanoffs for the last two and one-half centuries. Now, my friends, we can not shoot up or kill that kind of movement. If we are not strong enough and wise enough to remove the injustices and the wrongs, to restore security and confidence to the people, then these things will have to work themselves out in blindness and in wrath and in destruction. You have got to feed the Russian people on something besides bullets. That is the food which the Romanoffs have fed them for the last three centuries. America should adopt a different plan. You have got to remove the causes of disturbances or the disturbance will go on, for starving people are not afraid to die at the cannon's mouth. It is natural, therefore, that this writer, as well as the ex-President, entertaining the views they do, advocate a league which will not only determine controversies between different nations, but which will go into Russia, which will go into this country and into that country, and adjust the internal affairs of that particular nation in accordance with the program of the league.

You can see, therefore, that this conscript army for which Mr. Taft calls and the greatest navy in the world are not alone to settle the difficulties between the different nations, but they are to adjust and compose the internal difficulties of the different nations, especially if they are calculated to spread over national lines. Mr. Wells says here, giving an illustration of some of the things that may arise:

Such cases are highly probable, and no large, vague propositions about the "self-determination" of peoples can meet all the cases. In Macedonia, for instance, there is a jumble of Albanian, Serbian, Bulgarian, Greek, and Roumanian villages always jostling one another and maintaining an intense irritation between the kindred nations close at hand. And quite a large number of areas and cities in the world, it has to be remembered, are not homogeneous at all. Will the great nations of the world have the self-abnegation to permit a scattered subject population to appeal against the treatment of its ruling power to the supreme court? This is a much more serious interference with sovereignty than intervention in an external quarrel. Could a Greek village in Bulgarian Macedonia plead in the supreme court? Could the Armenians in Constantinople, or the Jews in Roumania, or the Poles in West Prussia, or the negroes in Georgia, or the Indians in the Transvaal make such an appeal?

The author seems to reason that unless these difficulties are adjustable before this tribunal and before the league it must necessarily result in disturbing the stability of the nations which compose the league. I do not myself see how we can avoid following the gentleman to the final conclusion where his logic leads.

Then he says:

Behind the decisions of the supreme court must lie power. And here come fresh difficulties for patriotic digestions. The armies and navies of the world must be at the disposal of the league of free nations, and that opens up a new, large area of delegated authority.

In a discussion of this subject in the New Statesman, an English publication, in a recent issue, this exceedingly interesting suggestion is made:

One of the first things to be considered by the league of nations must necessarily be the need for an international agreement for the enforcement in all countries of legislation on factory conditions, a maximum eight-hour day, the prevention of sweating and unhealthy trades necessary to protect the workers against exploitation and oppression, and the prohibition of night work for women.

Would the American workingman be willing to have the standards for labor, what constitutes exploitation and what constitutes oppression, determined by a supertribunal composed of representatives from nations whose labor standards are confessedly far below ours? Would it likely result in raising the standard to ours or lowering it to theirs? Could we compete against labor standards before a tribunal better than we can in actual fact, and would labor of this country be willing to throw down the bars to the labor standards of China, Japan, the Balkans, and countless south European countries?

No better illustration of the difference between theory and practice can be found than appeared in the public prints a few days ago. Mr. Gompers, the able and patriotic leader of the labor forces of this country, a recognized leader among the labor forces of the world, appeared before a committee of the Senate within the last few days and warned them and the country that labor would not stand for enforced arbitration, and then hastened away to the boat to take passage to Versailles to lend his influence to the league to enforce peace. While the laboring men of this country will not submit to a league to enforce peace in labor troubles, it is thought that a league to enforce peace throughout the world would be both practicable and satisfactory. Mr. Gompers was right. If labor consents to enforced or compulsory arbitration, it will result in labor becoming in many industries the peon of superior forces. But if labor, a part of the Nation, will not submit to the principle of enforced peace, shall all the people, of which labor is a part, submit to enforced peace? Is the principle of repression to be rejected by a part and not the whole of a nation? Can a people submit to compulsory arbitration things which may involve their liberty, their independence, their prosperity and industrial existence and labor reject it because it is supposed to be inimical to its vital interests? And how would labor like to submit to enforced peace or compulsory arbitration at the hands of a tribunal composed of members whom, save one, they had no voice in selecting or electing and whose viewpoint might be wholly different from the viewpoint of those upon whose interests they were passing? How would American labor like to submit its vital interests, the question of wages, of sanitariness, to a tribunal composed of a Chinaman, a Japanese, a Bulgarian, and a Russian, and even the nations with labor standards much higher? And yet is it not clear, and does not Mr. Gompers know, that enforced peace at the hands of such a tribunal would inevitably have its effect upon the standards of American workingmen? If it were not for the common sense which the experiences of men inject into the schemes and dreams of men, what a bubble-chasing life we would live—at least until supper time.

Another quotation from this earnest and illuminating article in the New Statesman is interesting and possibly instructive. It should be remembered that this is an article which works out the whole plan in detail and leaves nothing to the imagination. We seem to get a better insight into just where we think we are going. It reads:

The league of nations that the world is about to establish ought, if it is to be anything more than the ropes of sand in which diplomatists have hitherto delighted, to have its District of Columbia, with its own metropolitan city independent of any other jurisdiction, free from the suspicion of police or economic pressure by any of its constituent units, conveniently easy of access for them all on the borders of the sea which has become the world's greatest highway; and last but not least, under climatic conditions making for composure rather than for nervous excitement.

It will be seen from this that the capital of the league is not to be upon this mundane sphere. It is to be in the celestial kingdom beside the crystal sea. Heaven alone knows who the president will be under such circumstances.

But summing it all up, the views of the ex-President, the platform of the league, the constructions placed upon the platform by its authors and by those who are in sympathy with it, here is what the league to enforce peace proposes: Conscription in time of peace and a large standing army; the greatest navy in the world; adding by the Navy alone to our great tax burdens from two hundred and fifty to three hundred million dollars a year; the transferring, if not legally, in effect, the power to declare war from the Congress of the United States to some tribunal over which the people themselves who must fight the battles and pay the taxes have no control; the renouncing of the doctrine of Washington and the entering of the politics and alliances of Europe; becoming a member of a league from which we can not withdraw; the abandonment of the Monroe doctrine and permitting Europe to interfere in the affairs of the western continent; the sending of American soldiers to Europe and Asia and Africa whenever any disturbance arises, although it may not affect our people at all; and the whole scheme has just one ultimate power, and that is military force—the same power and the same principle which every despot has relied upon in his efforts against the people when the people were seeking greater liberty and greater freedom, the same power which George III and Wilhelm II made the basis of their infamous designs. That is the program to be given to the American people under the soporific term of a league to enforce peace.

Mr. President, I am not ashamed to say in these days of advanced thought and cosmopolitan faith that I believe in the old-time Americanism, in the policies and principles which made us great and which alone will keep us great. I want America, disenthralled and disentangled, by precept and example, through influence and counsel, to continue her lead in the grand march of civilization—in the world struggle for free government. What we need—and may Providence hasten the hour—is a rebaptism of the national spirit and a reconsecration to the national ideals. Give us again the vision and the courage of that steadfast pilot who guided our frail bark through the first perilous years; give us the Americanism which fired the fighting soul of Andrew Jackson; give us the faith in our institutions and the love of our common country of him who walked unscathed through the fierce fires of an internecine war to the deathless glory of martyrdom; give us a people bound together by the ties of respect and confidence, inspired by a common hope, devoted to a common country; give us something that is our very own, which we may love and for the preservation of which men are willing to die, and you will have an America, a United States, which will exert far more influence and dispense greater happiness and lead more certainly to world contentment than an America shorn of her individuality and embarrassed in her free movements by alliances or sickened and enfeebled by the international virus. I beg you to believe that there is nothing to take the place of this old-time Americanism. Let us cling to it as of old they clung to the horns of the altar. Let us foster it as you would foster the virtues about your own family hearthstone. Without it we will go the way of all the republics of the earth.

The fact is we have come in contact with two evil forces from the Old World—Prussianism and internationalism. Instead of repelling and rejecting them we are yielding to their slimy maw the proudest heritage ever left to the keeping of any people—American principles and the American conception of government. These two hands are not more alike than, in the last analysis, are the doctrines of Lenine and Trotsky and that of Wilhelm and Ludendorff. Both contemplate world dominion and the utter destruction of the national spirit everywhere. Each would undermine and destroy the individuality of all governments and compound all under one universal rule. Both are founded upon treachery, deceit, lying, repression, force, decimation, and assassination. They came together at Brest as naturally and as inevitably as common criminals combine to stay the hand of the law. They were both against America and everything for which America stands. But while civilization starts back in shuddering contemplation of the rule of either, certain American statesmen propose to take something from the creed of both and substitute it for the teachings of Washington and the faith of millions of American homes. Instead of our own Government, controlled and directed by the intelligence and patriotism of our own people, instead of American standards and American principles, instead of devotion to our institutions and to our own flag, we are to have an international superstate resting upon Prussian force, with a vast army of repression, a superstate in which the national spirit stands rebuked and the international flag is the sole symbol of our hopes. I do not know what the future has in store. I can not look very far into that time which is not yet. But I do know that there was brought into being on this western continent nearly 150 years ago an experiment in government which has weathered every storm, which was baptized with the wisdom of the greatest leader of this or any other age, which has excited the emulation and inspired the efforts of people in every quarter of the globe, which has given freedom and prosperity to the people at home and precept and example and inspiration to the world abroad. And as for me, I shall not by any act or vote of mine surrender it or even compromise it in the eyes of the world.

If the chief objects of government be that of disseminating happiness among its people and building character, of endowing the citizen with individual worth and the nation with collective strength, why should we turn our backs upon the policies of the past? Is there an American who, looking abroad in other lands and making his comparison, is not in this respect proud of the achievements of his country? Why should we disregard the teachings and disown the policies under which we have come to our present commanding position in the world? Or if the highest glory of a State be the devotion and love which the people bear it, where shall we look for greater glory than our own Government has experienced from the first until now? And when has the patriotism of its people known such exaltation as at this very hour? Go with me to Chateau-Thierry or look upon the scene at Belleau Wood. The crisis of the great war is at last at hand. The whole liberty-loving world is awaiting the contest. The stakes for which they fight is nothing less than civilization. All that the free people of the earth have, all they love is here to be saved or lost. Three brave nations are reeling under the fearful blows of organized barbarism—force incarnate. Circumstances and chance itself, that silent arbiter of so many battle fields, seem to favor the desperate foe. Can the enemy pass? Can he enter Paris? In this dread hour the American marines arrive upon the scene. They are boys from American homes—not soldiers by profession, not the Hessian puppets of some superinternational tribunal, nor yet the anemic minions or soulless scavengers of internationalism—they are red-blooded Americans, representing the majesty and the authority of a self-governing Nation accredited to their fearful task by the sovereign act of a free people, sustained and encouraged by the prayers around countless thousands of American hearthstones, themselves imbued with the spirit of liberty, fighting for the country they love; and as such they are invincible.

The thing which finally won this war, which overcame and beat down militarism—trained, efficient, disciplined, brutal militarism—was the Frenchman's love of country, the Briton's love of country, the American's love of country—that which internationalism would murder. This it was that stayed the march at the Marne; this it was that turned the tide at Chateau-Thierry; this it was that went into the Belleau Wood, which human fiends had made into an earthly hell, and dragged militarism from its chosen lair; this it is that defends the ideals of a nation. God pity the ideals of this Republic if they shall have no defenders save the gathered scum of the nations organized into a conglomerate international police force, ordered hither and thither by the most heterogeneous and irresponsible body or court that ever confused or confounded the natural instincts and noble passions of a people. Oh, no, Mr. President, let us leave these things—the lives of our people, the liberty of our whole Nation—in the keeping and under the control of those people who have brought this Republic to its present place of prestige and power. What we need in this hour is faith in the institutions that our fathers gave us, faith in the career which everything indicates we shall enjoy unless we in public place prove recreant to our duties in this great and trying hour.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I shall not take much of the time from the Senator from Colorado nor much of the time of the Senate. I understand the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has just made a speech in its main intendment bearing against the proposition of a league of nations. I want to insert in the RECORD a couple of short poems, and I want to say nothing about them except that the first one was written by the author soon after her boys had been reported to be dead. All that she had went, all that she had died, and she wrote these lines:

Lie down and sleep,
Leave it with God to keep,
This sorrow, which is part
Now of your heart.
When you awake,
If still 'tis there to take,
Utter no wild complaint;
Work waits your hands;
If you should faint,
God understands.

That was published some time ago, coming from the pen of Katrina Trask. Later on came this answer to the Senator from Idaho, and it is complete and sufficient, although she did not even know that he was going to speak. It is entitled "Citizens, arise!"

CITIZENS, ARISE!

[By Katrina Trask.]

Rise, Citizens, arise! the mad world war is done,
But our divinest duty has only now begun:
With every power we now must work to make a righteous world,
To hold Truth's standard steadfast, to wave Truth's flag, unfurled,
To plow and sow the shadowed earth until it blooms anew,
To make the Word of Prophet and Philosopher come true.

Not the word of the so-called "practical man" who never saw beyond his nose in his life—

'Tis ours to help, to teach mankind to choose the better part—
To clasp kind hands with brother, not to shoot him thro' the heart.
To us the glorious victory, O Citizens, is given
To bring to this black, bloody Earth a foretaste of clean Heaven.
Let beast tear beast to fragments, let ruthless savage fight:
For man there dawns a morning—a clearer, holier light:
Redemption, federation, are possible at last—
Great hopes that have been cherished in all the ages past.

This was written by a woman whose boys were dead, not written by me or any other man who was in the safest bomb-proof position on the surface of the earth, to wit, the floor of the Senate of the United States—

Behold! the dreams that prophets dreamed are now upon the way—
A league of nations may be formed to match the dawning day,
A bond of human brotherhood, a true God-welded bond,
To hold mankind together, with cohesion far beyond
The strength that comes from weapons and from armaments of might,
Nations allied to nations by everlasing right.

"Everlasting right," which, in the long run, by the way, I will say is might—

This potent league of nations will need no gun nor sword,
Its order is the law of the Everliving Lord—

"The Everliving Lord," who still exists, I do not care what you say about it—

The law of harmony, all brutal war shall cease—
Its corner stone is justice, its translucent walls are peace.
Rise, citizens! Arise from the weary, blood-drenched sod, Proclaim the league of nations—sealed with the seal of God!

"Translucent walls"! Anybody not a fool can see through them. They are translucent—God is behind them. Ultimately you must see Him, whether you will or not.

"With the seal of God," and, thank God, not with the seal of the Senate of the United States, unless the Senate shall hereafter indicate a sufficient degree of common sense to affix its seal, which I doubt.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I thank the Senator from Colorado for yielding to the Senator from Mississippi that we might be regaled by that profound discussion of a league of nations?

CONDITIONS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on the 12th day of December last the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] introduced a resolution requesting the Secretary of State to send to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, "all data, documents, and information showing or bearing upon our present relations with Russia as to peace or war, so that the Senate and the Nation may know why and for what purpose our soldiers are in Russia and what is the policy of the Government in reference to Russia, and if not incompatible with the public interest to advise the Senate of the number of United States soldiers in Russia and their location, and of their operations, together with any lists of casualties which they may have suffered."

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I am a member. It there became the subject of consideration shortly afterwards and again just prior to the Christmas holidays. On each of those occasions I voted to report the resolution to the Senate. Should it again become the subject of discussion I shall, if opportunity be given, again cast my vote for its appearance upon the calendar.

I do not, Mr. President, mean to be understood as favoring the resolution because of my attitude toward it as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations; but I believe that, inasmuch as the suppression of a resolution can not suppress the discussion of its substance, and inasmuch as the resolution calls for information to which the Senator and the public in general are entitled, unless it be incompatible with the public interest, and inasmuch as such information will be withheld if it is so incompatible, nothing can be gained by keeping it within the possession of a committee.

Moreover, a failure to report so important a resolution justifies the impression that the real purpose is to withhold the information desired, whatever the real purpose may be. Hence the very conditions which the withholding of a resolution may be designed to prevent will assert themselves because it is withheld.

There are two methods of reporting a resolution—one favorable, the other adverse. Either is sufficient to place it on the calendar, and neither is necessary to a full discussion and consideration of its purpose. Hence I felt, and I still feel, that some committee disposition should be made of this resolution, to the end that we may dispose of it and proceed to the consideration of other and perhaps more exigent business during the short session of this Congress.

The resolution involves in some degree the great question of allied duty toward Russia, not only for the present but for the future, and I have no doubt that one of the reasons actuating the Senator from California in introducing the resolution was to enable him, by information to be obtained through it, to intelligently discuss all features of the situation. I regard it as one of the very important problems now confronting the allies; one which they can not avoid; one which they must solve if we are to have, indeed, a permanent peace after a hard-earned victory. I think, Mr. President, that we can aid in the solution of that problem by considering their former attitude toward Russia and the part which that great people have played in the war during its first two years.

Mr. President, the primary object which Germany had in view when upon the 1st day of August, 1914, she declared war against Russia was the overwhelming of that great nation. Bismarck had taught his people the importance of conquering other nations, one by one, and of preventing, so far as diplomacy and falsehood could do so, any interference with that program by other nations.

Russia had just emerged from a disastrous war with Japan. She had not yet fully reconstituted her civil government, her army, or her navy. She was in that formative process through which every nation must pass after a great war. She was potentially formidable in her vast population and in her vaster territory. Her reestablishment as the practically dominating balance of power in Europe would impose limitations upon German ambitions and German expansion.

To avoid this embarrassment Russia must be overthrown as the first step toward world dominion. It is therefore a significant fact that immediately upon the service by Austria of the ultimatum upon Serbia and the known attitude of Russia as the protector of Serbia, Germany at once became prominent in the negotiations preceding the declaration of war, and that she declared war against Russia six days before Austria did so, although the mobilization of the Russian forces was aimed at Austria and officially declared to be for that purpose only. The interval between the service of that ultimatum and Germany's declaration of war against Russia was utilized by the Kaiser in the effort to detach both France and England from the struggle. Germany's purpose was to mass her forces upon the eastern frontier and to make Russia the first victim of her terrific power. Russia crushed, the ultimate problem which France and England presented would, as a matter of course, be greatly simplified and the ultimate result made morally certain.

Germany supposed Great Britain would remain neutral in the event of a declaration of hostilities because of her domestic difficulties. Ireland was upon the verge of civil war; disaffection ran riot throughout her dominions in India; and, by some strange mental aberration, the German people believed that England's entry into a world war would be inevitably followed by the desertion of her colonies. She was, therefore, much more concerned with France.

Her ambassador was instructed to ascertain, in the event of a declaration of war against Russia, whether France would remain aloof from the struggle and virtually disregard and disavow her obligations to Russia, assumed some time before under treaty stipulations with which the world is familiar. Should she respond favorably to the ambassador's inquiries he was authorized to say to the French Government:

If it declares it will remain neutral, your Excellency will be good enough to declare that we must, as a guarantee of its neutrality, require the handing over of the fortresses of Toul and Verdun; that we will occupy them and restore them after the end of the war with Russia. A reply to this last question must reach here before Saturday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

The reply of France to this astounding demand has become historic. Germany thereupon declared war against Russia, and shortly afterwards against France. Germany struck France first. She expected to overwhelm that great people, while Austria, her forces having been mobilized, should hold Russia in check on the eastern front. The Central Empires would then easily overcome Russia, and Germany, as the mistress of Europe, would then dispose of England and America when her interests required it.

This, then, Mr. President, was Germany's original war program, and it may be said that because of the preparation which she had made and the weaknesses which, largely through her intrigues, were then apparent among her enemies, every probability indicating her swift and sure success. Disregarding treaty obligations, her vast army poured over little Belgium, held for a short time by the gallant though ineffective defense of that splendid people. She swept through northeastern France, and within the short space of 60 days the sound of her guns was heard upon the streets and boulevards of the great city of Paris.

Mr. President, the actual winning of the war has been attributed to many causes. Some say the intervention of America; some, British supremacy upon the sea; others, the food supply; and still others the morale of the Anglo-Saxon. All these causes were, to my mind, essential to the great victory, but we must not overlook the part which Russia played during the time that she was in this war as one of its most active participants.

It is true that Russia was the typical despotism of the world; that under the Government of the Romanoffs neither life nor property was safe from the ambitions or the whims of the monarch; that, as compared to Russia, Prussian kaiserism had its elements of attraction and superiority. I make no defense either of the Czar or of the character of his Government, for neither is compatible with American ideals of liberty and justice; but the fact must be told, as a part of the history of the war, that the cooperation of the most despotic Government in the world with the freer and more enlightened countries of western Europe made it possible to defeat German ambitions and to dethrone the House of Hohenzollern.

Before the French frontier had been reached by the German armies the Grand Duke crossed the eastern frontiers of Germany and entered upon German territory with hundreds of thousands of his troops, and between that hour and the time when the German forces reached the Marne the German general staff was compelled to detach 13 divisions from the army of von Kluck and speed them with all haste under the command of Ludendorff to the eastern frontier. I need not ask whether the miracle of the Marne would have been possible but for this diminution of German force at such a time.

Shortly afterwards, when the little army of England was the sole impediment between the legions of the Kaiser and the channel ports, another demonstration by the Grand Duke required the detachment of 15 more German divisions to withstand the increasing menace upon the eastern frontier. I need not ask whether but for that situation the splendid little army of England would not have been sacrificed in vain.

I can not take the time to describe in detail the many—because they were numerous—instances in which the cooperation of the Russian Army and the Russian Government with those of France and England saved the day to civilization. It may, however, throw some light upon the general subject and illustrate the extent of Russian sacrifice for the allied cause to refer to Russian casualties during her engagement as an active combatant in this mighty struggle.

The lowest estimate which I have seen of Russian casualties is 9,500,000 and the highest 12,000,000. I think perhaps the average of these two figures would conservatively state her actual losses from the 1st day of August, 1914, until the Bolshevist appeared, when her armies collapsed and she disappeared as a combatant in the struggle against Teutonic world dominion. This average is 10,750,000.

Russia's losses, therefore, exceeded the total casualties of France, England, Italy, and the United States from the commencement of the war to its triumphant close, on the 11th day of November. Her actual losses of life are estimated in round numbers at three and a half millions of men, equaling those of all her allies. If buried side by side in a straight and unbroken line, their graves would cover a distance of 2,000 miles. And we must not forget that during the time when Russia was an active ally her soldiers were poorly clad; they were poorly armed; they were betrayed by enemies at home while holding at bay those upon the front; but, notwithstanding all these terrible drawbacks, the Russian soldier always fought. He fought whether advancing or retiring. When there was 1 rifle to 2 men he fought, when the supply became 1 to 5 he fought, and when they were reduced from 1 to 10 he still fought on, waiting his turn to take the rifle falling from the hands of the dying man who held it.

What would have been the result of this conflict but for the heroism of the Russian soldier, but for the activities of the Russian Czar, but for the tremendous Russian front, extending from the shores of the Baltic Sea to the confines of Constantinople, compelling a division of the forces of the central powers for more than two years, when the Russian Government collapsed and chaos supervened? We can not conceive, although we are very prone to forget, the far-reaching and immeasurable benefits she conferred upon civilization and upon democracy by these heroic efforts and sacrifices. Indeed, so tremendous are they that we may condone much of the conduct which has since characterized Russia's attitude toward this great war.

I express no regret over the downfall of the Czar or any sentiment but approval of the action of the Russian people in determining that the time had come for their emancipation.

Indeed, Mr. President, the anachronism between the Russian despotism of the East and the British and French democracies of the West united against the same foe, for the same purpose, and practically committed to the same future destiny was too manifest to have resulted otherwise. It was not only inconsistent—under ordinary circumstances it would have been unbelievable—but the contrast did more to hasten the hour of the overthrow of the Romanoffs than any other single influence.

The Government overthrown, a provisional government was established in its place, which was immediately recognized by the allied powers. It had the confidence of the world, and evidently had behind it the progressive, orderly, and liberty-loving forces of that great people. Unfortunately it was a weak government in experience, comprised largely of incapable men, who believed rather in compromise with the turbulent elements always accompanying changes in government than in meeting and repressing them for the time being, to the end that social and industrial stability might attend the crystallization of the new order into permanency and strength.

At this time Nicholas Lenine, since noted as the real ruler of Russia, was a refugee in Switzerland, where, during the previous period of the great struggle, he was preaching in German interest the doctrine of misgovernment and demoralization and using his influence wherever possible against the cause of the allies, while Leon Trotzky, high in the councils of the I. W. W., was denouncing the Government of the United States upon the streets of the city of New York. Both were working against the allies, and both went to Russia as soon as possible after the overthrow of the Czar as emissaries and representatives of the Kaiser; and from the time of their return to this good hour they have represented forces antagonistic to everything for which the allies stand and to every principle upon which the American Government has been established.

These succeeding the weak and despicable Kerensky government represent the forces and the influences now confronting us and which are directly involved in our attempted solution of the Russian problem. Russia's sacrifices and heroism under the Czar and her base and cowardly betrayals of her allies under the Bolshevists are its principal factors.

It is perhaps a fortunate circumstance for us that America entered the war after the Czar's abdication. She never was the ally of a despot, however greatly her sympathy with the cause to which he devoted himself, his people, and his resources. America's entry into the war almost synchronized with the abdication of the Czar. To us, therefore, came from Russia's new government appeals for that aid which she must have if she were to continue the struggle. I well recall the occasion when, in this Chamber, the new ambassador from the provisional government addressed the Senate from the platform which you, Mr. President (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair), now occupy. I well remember the enthusiasm with which his assurances and his pledge of Russia's aid to the end were greeted. We responded to that appeal at once. We responded with money, with men, with supplies. We gave of our abundance in unstinted measure of every resource upon which we could draw. We were conscious of the great debt which civilization owed to Russia. We were conscious of the obligations of the American Government to every people struggling for freedom and imitating our example; and, above all, we were conscious of the necessity of continuing the eastern front intact, and by that means hastening the war to a glorious conclusion.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his recent report, tells us that a credit was established after April 6, 1917, with Russia of $325,000,000, of which cash advances were $187,729,000, and balances under established credits were $137,270,000. All this occurred before Kerensky's downfall. The money advanced was perhaps the smallest part of our contribution. We sent engineers, we sent industrial experts, we sent economists, we sent mechanics, we sent from every class of our citizens those who were competent by their experience and education to expand the great resources of that mighty country and to continue its industries, to the end that they might become effective agencies in the prosecution of the war and minister to the well-being of the Russian people after its close.

Upon the wharves of Vladivostok, American supplies soon appeared in tremendous bulk and quantity, consisting of artillery, ammunition, clothing, railway supplies, hundreds of new American locomotives, and all the paraphernalia essential to an active and vigorous offensive. We united with our allies in landing supplies nearer the field of action, and large quantities, valued at hundreds of millions, were also sent to the Murman coast and to Archangel, there to be transported over two lines of railroads to Petrograd and to the front. During the time we were transporting these huge supplies France and England were calling for all the aid upon the western front that we could give them. Losses by the submarines far outstripped our capacity of construction. Our soldiers were going over slowly, our supplies more slowly. Both could have been vastly increased could we have utilized the tonnage essential to the transportation of Russian supplies. Uncle Sam did his bit in the Orient as well as upon the western front, and responded to every call from the Russian people up to the hour when the Kerensky government collapsed and Bolshevism rose from its ruins armed with the torch and the dagger.

Mr. President, in this we only did our duty. We did it manfully, and the sacrifices which we made we would duplicate were we confronted with a similar emergency.

But during this time in what work were the agencies now in control of Russia busily engaged? They were engaged in demoralizing the army, in undermining the navy, in slandering the allies and their cause. They preached animosity to Americans and the American Government. They were the most potent forces working for German militarism and the undoing of democracy outside the ranks of the German Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Senator will yield while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

Mr. THOMAS. It is not necessary, Mr. President, to rehearse the bloody and dismal tragedy of Bolshevik supremacy from the hour when Lenine and Trotzky became the dominant forces in Russia down to the date of the Brest-Litovsk treaty. That treaty embodied conditions dictated by Germany and was negotiated at a time when its psychological effect upon the allied morale would be far-reaching and possibly disastrous. Lenine and Trotsky received their orders from Berlin and obeyed them with alacrity.

The prospect was a somber one for the allied forces all through the fall and winter of 1917–18. It was during that period that the tide of their fortunes reached its lowest ebb. It was first signalized by the final collapse of the entire Russian land and naval forces. Then followed the Caporetta disaster to Italy, an event which turned the tide completely within 48 hours upon the Italian front and threw the magnificent Italian Army, broken and demoralized, back to the plains of Venetia. They narrowly escaped utter annihilation, but were rescued through the heroic efforts of Diaz, who re-formed and held his broken lines upon the Piave River. Saloniki was thus left to its own resources; and Roumania, surrounded by enemies, collapsed and surrendered.

The Brest-Litovsk treaty was therefore aptly timed and while the shock of the Caporetta disaster was putting French valor and British nerve to the supreme test. That treaty, Mr. President, will go down into history as the most shameful and humiliating surrender of a great nation recorded in the tides of time. To call it a treaty is to play with words. It was Bolshevik betrayal of civilization in the name and by the apparent authority of the Russian people. Except the subsequent surrender of the German fleet without a blow, it stands as a reproach to the integrity of every human virtue.

Lenine and Trotsky, at the command of their German employers, invited the allied nations to participate in their treaty deliberations and extended to them the advantages and privileges they pretended to hope for as a result of their efforts. Impudence and insolence could not go beyond this.

What did it accomplish? It placed Russia absolutely at the mercy of Germany. It released not less than 500,000 effective veteran German soldiers for duty upon the western front. It enabled Germany for the first time during the history of the war to concentrate all her forces at a given point. It enabled her to abandon the eastern front to second and third class soldiers, who went from Province to Province, from city to city, and from section to section without meeting any resistance whatever, and to annihilate Roumania, who fought on, notwithstanding the Russian debâcle and in the face of the most fearful odds that ever confronted a weak and dying people.

I only refer to the March drive for the purpose of emphasizing its importance as a Bolsheviki contribution to the German cause. That it did not succeed was little short of miraculous. Nothing there saved the allies except the incomparable discipline of the French and the bulldog determination of the Anglo-Saxon. But for these two indispensable and unconquerable attributes, the channel ports would have been reduced and Paris taken. The war would have ended in the triumph of Germany, and the triumph of Germany would have been due to its Bolsheviki mercenaries.

Fortunately, the tide of battle finally went the other way, and we can say with truth and a feeling of devout thankfulness that our victory was achieved over all the powers of man and all the powers of hell; achieved against the Kaiser of Germany and the Bolsheviki of Moscow and Petrograd.

Meantime, Mr. President, what was this so-called government doing on its own account? What were its other contributions to German success and to German victory? It repudiated Russia's debts to all other nations, including the allies. It repudiated its $325,000,000 of obligations just assumed to the United States.

It outraged ambassadors and murdered consuls, outraged the rights of the citizens and subjects of other countries, conducted its campaign of murder and robbery against the stranger within its gate as against the unfortunate people subject to its domination. It confiscated the property of allied citizens and subjects everywhere. It robbed Roumania of the little fund of gold which it had deposited in Petrograd as a safeguard in the hour of possible disaster. It sold all war supplies that could be found to German agents; it sent its own throughout the country gathering them up and delivering them upon whatever terms the Germans might impose. It delivered the Russian fleet to Germany, a transaction as shameful though not so extensive as the subsequent surrender of the German fleet. It submitted to Germany's cold exactions and depleted the Russian treasury, that Germany might profit thereby. All this time it proclaimed its animosity to all forms of organized government, its bitter hatred of Germany and of everything German, its mission to revolutionize and destroy the world in the cause of idealistic principles and a bloody pretense of universal brotherhood.

It encountered domestic difficulties, one of the most important of which was the obstinacy of the Finnish people, who determined to set up a government of their own upon the principle of self-determination, and who did so, thereby incurring Bolshevik invasion, pledged to Finnish massacre, robbery, and subjugation in the name of brotherhood and democracy.

Finland appealed to the Kaiser. She threw herself into the arms of Germany, and the Kaiser, nothing loath, instantly responded. Between a union of his troops and the White Guard, bolshevism was repelled. Pending the determination of which German prince should occupy the throne of Finland, German forces menaced Archangel and the Murman coast through Finnish territory. Her purpose was obvious. First, she desired these northern ports for another submarine base. America and Great Britain had thrown a barrage of bombs and mines across the northern boundary of the North Sea, and submarine outlets to the Atlantic were mined with tragedy and disaster.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I dislike to interrupt the Senator in his very able exposition of the situation, but it seems to me at this point where he mentions Finland it would not be inappropriate to invite attention to the fact that there has been unjust criticism in our own land of the Finnish people. The Finnish people did not desire an alliance with Germany, but, as the Senator from Colorado has stated, they invoked Germany because they preferred German protection to Bolshevik rule. The Finnish people are democratic and desire a liberal progressive democracy. They do not desire bolshevism and they do not desire German control.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, some day the history of the laying of that barrage will be given to the public. It will constitute one of the most thrilling incidents of this war. Suffice it to say, it was an effective barrier to that outlet into the Atlantic Ocean. It is true that an occasional submarine might successfully negotiate the passage, but equally true that it had been made practically inaccessible to submarines. Germany was therefore dependent upon the channel, perhaps more dangerous than the barrier to the north of the sea, and these northern submarine bases were absolutely essential to the further prosecution of her submarine campaign.

Her second object was the securing of the vast stores of supplies and munitions which the allies had landed at these harbors, which they and the Red Guards were equally anxious to obtain.

Meantime she was also intriguing with Bolshevik authorities for the capture and utilization of the stores at Vladivostok, which, of course, involved control of the Siberian Railroad. To that I shall presently refer.

The allies met, as they should have met, that situation by throwing a force as soon as possible on the Murman coast and into Archangel. I can not conceive what criticism of them would not be just if they had failed to act upon the crisis as they did. The only one which occurs to me as now applicable is that the force was not as large as it should have been, but Germany at that time had her hands too full with the marines and American soldiers and soldiers of the allies on the western front, and the menace therefore to throw additional detachments northward developed its Bolshevist features, for German stress was Bolshevist opportunity, and the Red Guards again overwhelmed Finland and threatened both Archangel and the Murman coast. But our forces were still on guard and our supplies intact. When they are withdrawn our property must be withdrawn also.

I come now, Mr. President, to another one of the fundamental events which helped to win the war. Had it not occurred there is every probability that the hundreds of thousands of German and Austrian prisoners in Russia would have been speedily repatriated and remustered into the armies of the central powers, and Germany would have secured possession of the Siberian Railway and of the vast allied supplies at Vladivostok. I refer, of course, to the retreat of the Czecho-Slovakian forces.

It will be recalled that during the campaign of 1916 Gen. Brusiloff, in his offensive against Galicia, captured about 500,000 prisoners. The facts are that most of those prisoners were Czecho-Slovaks who deliberately, taking their guns with them, left the ranks of the Austrian Army and eagerly surrendered to the Russians. They were inspired, rightly or wrongly, by their views of patriotic duty. They were devoted not to Austria but to their own people, who had been subjected to Austrian oppression and domination for centuries. They perceived that the war gave them the great opportunity of time, and that they would be faithless to their countrymen and to themselves did they not take advantage of it. After their surrender they volunteered for the Russian service, were mustered into her forces, and held their part of the eastern front from the good hour when they became an integral part of the Russian Army and long after the main Russian force had collapsed. Not until they were the only remaining force upon the eastern front with arms in their hands did they retire.

The Austrian Government offered them full immunity and full pardon, provided they would return to their former allegiance and reenter the Austrian service. They were also urged by the Bolsheviki to identify themselves with the Red Guard. True to themselves and to their faith, they spurned both of these temptations and determined upon a course which will command the admiration of mankind for all time. They resolved to continue the fight for the allies and to proceed, regardless of obstacles, from the Russian front across Russia and Siberia to Pacific ports, across the Pacific Ocean to San Francisco and Seattle, across the American Continent to our Atlantic ports, and across the Atlantic Ocean to the front in France.

Mr. President, these heroic men determined in the face of the most appalling difficulties and dangers to traverse three-quarters of the globe and reappear as militant soldiers against the power of the German Kaiser. When we consider the distances, the vast spaces by land and by sea, the desolation of the Siberian desert, the limitless difficulties of transportation across two oceans, the dangers lurking in their pathway across the 5,000 miles of territory stretching from the Ukraine to Vladivostok, and their resolution to brave them all, we may well conclude that the heroism and moral courage of man admits of no limitation. They began that march. They were assured free conduct by the Bolsheviki Government only to have them revoked through the intrigues of the German Government. They disregarded the revocation. They were then assured that if they would surrender their arms to the Bolsheviki they would be permitted free and safe passage to Vladivostok. They surrendered their arms, and as a result were immediately attacked by the Red Guard. With bare hands, the only weapons that nature gives to man, these heroes assumed the offensive against their treacherous enemies, recaptured their arms, and continued their march to the Pacific Ocean.

Not only so, but they maintained themselves as a fighting force against the rapidly accumulating Red Guard army, manned with German munitions and officered by German veteran commanders. They saved the Russian situation. They saved the Siberian line of communication. They relieved the pressure on the western front. They compelled the retention in Russia of that vast body of German and Austrian prisoners which under the treaty of Brest-Litovsk would have been rapidly transported back to the central empires and reincorporated into their militant armies.

It must not be assumed for a moment, Mr. President, that the progress of these men was attended by unbroken triumphs. On the contrary, their very existence was more than once imperiled. They appealed more than once to the allies for aid, and finally, through the efforts of Masaryk, now President of the Czecho-Slovak Nation, that appeal was heard. They asked to be aided in the struggle to reach the Pacific Ocean. They said, and said truly, that theirs was the only force representing the allied powers in Russia. Their supplies were exhausted. Their ammunition had practically given out. Their clothing was in tatters. They were menaced by constantly increasing foes. They called upon the allies for help, and they called in vain for weeks and months. Winter, with all its Siberian horrors, confronted them. Death in its most horrible form lurked in their rear and threatened their flanks, embodied in the powers of the Red Guard.

Finally some action was taken. The allies sent a force to Vladivostok, and the President announced in August what our purposes and objects were. The Johnson resolution recites that announcement.

I have heard this episode compared to Xenophon's retreat of the Ten Thousand. It is the only thing in history that furnishes any parallel. But Xenophon's Ten Thousand marched a bare thousand miles up the Tigris from central Persia to the Black Sea and then reenlisted as mercenaries in the ranks of another contestant. These men in a hostile country, destitute of clothing and provisions and almost destitute of arms, determined to march over 10,000 miles of land and traverse 3,000 leagues of ocean, not to enlist as mercenaries but to continue to fight for their ideals of freedom and of justice and to liberate their countrymen, their wives, and children from the tyranny and oppression of Austria. Xenophon's memorable episode fades into insignificance when compared with this epic of the Czecho-Slovak, fighting every foot of their beleaguered way. This campaign of 150,000 heroic central Europeans, inspired by devotion to the greatest cause that ever animated mankind, justified its sacrifice of blood and treasure.

As I have said, we finally and reluctantly yielded to this appeal and dispatched a very small contingent of soldiers, together with those of France and Great Britain, with a very much larger contingent of Japanese, to their relief. Japan announced her purpose by a pronunciamento of August 2. Her Government declared that it "agreed with the American Government to dispatch troops to relieve the pressure weighing upon the Czecho-Slovak forces, who, aspiring to secure a free and independent existence for their race and loyally espousing the common cause of the allies, justly command every sympathy and consideration for the belligerents.

"In adopting this course the Japanese Government remains constant in their desire to promote relations of enduring friendship, and they reaffirm their avowed policy of respecting the territorial integrity of Russia and of abstaining from interference in her internal politics."

They further declare that upon the realization of the objects above indicated they will immediately withdraw all Japanese troops from Russian territories and will leave wholly unimpaired the sovereignty of Russia in all its phases."

Mr. President, this comparatively small contingent of soldiers rescued the Czecho-Slovaks within the territory lying between Vladivostok and Lake Baikal, but there is a considerable body of them west of the lake who need all the force that the allies can spare for their rescue from certain annihilation, yet it is announced that not only America, but Great Britain and Japan, according to dispatches of this morning, have determined to withdraw all of their troops from Asia, thus leaving these heroic souls to their fate.

I assert that if we carry out this program and desert these men, we will put an ineffaceable stain upon the glorious record of the allies. We owe it to every consideration of justice, of decency, and of gratitude to rescue every Czecho-Slovak soldier in Russia from that hell of bolshevism, aid him in returning to his country, now, for the first time in centuries, enjoying the blessings of freedom. I am amazed that, our task being half done, we propose to abandon it and leave these immortals to the terrible fate confronting them. It is wrong, and posterity will hold us, and ought to hold us, accountable if we now desert these heroic men, who saved the situation upon the eastern front, who deserve our immediate and most effective assistance, who are allies in very truth, and who in the immortal words of Lincoln have given our cause the full measure of devotion. If we now withdraw, it is certain that before the suns and showers of springtime shall again visit the earth we will read of their massacre, attended by circumstances that will revive our schoolboy memories of death and torture by American savages and African bushmen.

Moreover, Mr. President, our enormous stores are still at Vladivostok. Scarcely anything that we sent there has found transportation farther west. They were all seized by Bolshevist looters. Some of them were scattered and sold for a song.

They will become a total loss if we are to abandon Russia altogether.

I for one protest, Mr. President, against the withdrawal of American troops either from the Archangel coast or from Vladivostok until every American and every dollar's worth of allied property has been salvaged and returned.

The complaint which I make, Mr. President, is that the force which we sent to Russia was insufficient. I grant you that they may have been exposed to undue danger and peril; I grant you that, with the ever-increasing Bolshevik menace, they may be seriously imperiled; but should we, Mr. President, withdraw because of that fact? Should we not rather reenforce our gallant men at both these critical points, that we may successfully establish ourselves there until the need which requires it shall have been fully subserved.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have been very much interested in the remarks of the Senator from Colorado, with the latter part of which I very fully agree; but I want to ask him a question, if it will not interrupt him to have me do so. Does the Senator understand that the Bolshevik soldiers in Russia to-day are largely officered by Germans?

Mr. THOMAS. They are largely officered by Germans. Their instruction has been entirely that of German officers. The Bolshevik program, among other things, resulted in the murder of Russian officers; indeed, of every one who fell into their clutches.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Further, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if we have no power under our armistice agreement to compel Germany to take those officers out of Russia?

Mr. THOMAS. The terms of the armistice require that the German forces occupying any Russian territory shall evacuate it, but that does not meet this difficulty. These officers are Germans, but they are not now German officers. They are the commanders of the Russian army and are an integral part of the Russian force. Consequently they are no longer subject to the orders of the German Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, if, under the terms of the armistice, we should compel our small forces which are in the country now to come out of Russia we would not only sacrifice largely the Russian people who welcomed our forces there and who would welcome, no doubt, an additional force and the establishment of a government along the lines on which the allies entered the war, but it would neutralize all that we have done. Such a course is based on neither right, duty, nor justice. What the allies ought to do, in my opinion, is to send enough soldiers into Russia to assist our comrades there in arms and to help the people who fought with us so bravely for the freedom of the world to establish a government of their own choosing rather than to allow them to be starved first and then slaughtered like beasts by a force infinitely worse than that of the despised Prussian armies. The Bolshevik government is a creature inspired by the German Kaiser. Their agents and soldiers were sent into Russia to organize it, and it seems to me to be all one common enemy.

For myself, I am free to say that I fear the red flag of Russia. I have repeatedly talked with Members of this body, pointing out, as I saw it, its great and immediate danger to our peace conference at Versailles, as well as the European countries as a whole. I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, if it is not stamped out now and forever, it will be a living menace to the European countries and may eventually control them. And I also greatly fear its influence upon our own Nation. I have argued that it was the first question that ought to be taken up and settled, and time only convinces me that my conclusions were right.

Bolshevikism is an enemy to every civilized nation in the world, and I fail to see why we are not to-day at war with the same class of people that we have been since we allied ourselves with the Russian people.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, the problem is fraught with a great many difficulties, and its solution with a great many undesirable consequences.

It is said, Mr. President, in view of the fact that conflicts have occurred between our own and the Red Guard troops, that we are making war upon Russia. I do not think that our troops were sent there with guns in their hands simply to stand quietly and let the enemy run over them. Foch says the best of all defenses is an offensive, and that is also a fundamental principle in the strategy of the German staff; but, be that as it may, the Red Guard troops will not be troubled by our troops at Archangel or at Murman if they let them alone, and because we have successfully attacked them some distance from Archangel by no means implies that we are waging a war against them. We are protecting our property and our citizens as far as we can reach them, and I think that it is our duty to continue to do so. I confess to much apprehension regarding the situation there, because of the constantly increasing Red Guard forces and the constantly diminishing allied forces. It seems to me that England, France, and the United States are pursuing the worst possible policy, which is the policy of inaction. If there are not troops enough for the purpose, they should either be reinforced or withdrawn. To withdraw them without taking also the property which they were sent there to safeguard would render the entire enterprise humiliating and disgraceful, if not absurd. It is said by some that we are warring against an ally.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Apropos of the statement of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], I desire to say that lately I have been talking with a man who recently came from Russia, and he stated that the withdrawal of the troops from the Murman coast and from Archangel would subject to massacre at the hands of the Red Guard the Russians who have been loyal to the allies and loyal to the views for which the allies contended and the 6,000 or 7,000 Russian soldiers who were there operating with the allied troops.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly they would share the fate now threatening the few Czecho-Slovaks operating west of Lake Baikal.

Mr. President, we are not warring against an ally. Russians who have acted with the allies have begged for intervention much more actively than they have received it. If there is any element in Russia which deserves intervention at the hand of the allies it is that element which cooperated with them during the reign of the Czar, during the existence of the provisional government, and of the Kerensky administration.

But, Mr. President, the Bolsheviki long ago declared war against us. They have declared war against every established government upon the face of the earth. They have announced their purpose to wage war until they are overthrown. Theirs is an international movement; and they make no disguise of the fact. Theirs is a movement designed to substitute for established government everywhere the Bolshevik government of Russia. They proclaim eternal warfare against all organized society. How, then, can it be said that we are making war against an ally? God deliver us from such an ally! It is Bolshevik influence that is opposing peace; that is embarrassing the reconstruction of Roumania; that has postponed the crystallization of the governmental forces of the Czecho-Slovaks and the Jugo-Slavs. At the behest of the imperialists of Germany, and under the leadership of Liebknecht, they are endeavoring to reduce the condition of that unhappy people to chaos, that their followers may plunder the multitude, while junkerdom secures the return and restoration of the Hohenzollern dynasty.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. I will do so in just a moment. There is grave danger that these influences will overwhelm both Poland and the Slovak peoples before a treaty of peace shall have been negotiated and the allies shall have framed even the rudiments of their proposed league to enforce peace.

Now I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. In connection with what the Senator from Colorado is just stating, I invite his attention to the fact that recently there have appeared in Hungary a number of the Russian Red Guard and representatives of Lenine and Trotzky, with Russian gold and Bolshevik paper money, and that they are doing everything possible to prevent the Hungarians from establishing a stable form of government upon the ruins of the Austrian Empire.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, I have considerable material upon that feature of the situation as affecting not only Hungary but many others.

To give a fair notion of what the Bolshevik idea of its relations to other Governments should be, let me recall the Bolshevik proposal to Great Britain for the establishment of diplomatic relations, which, of course, involved the recognition by Great Britain of the Bolshevik government. The British authorities said, "Suppose that we do this, we understand that your diplomats, in the event we receive them, will at once become the advocates of bolshevism in Great Britain." The answer was, "Certainly; that is why we want to make this arrangement. Our ministers and our consuls will be instructed to propagate bolshevism wherever possible, to urge your people to overthrow your Government, to tear down the pillars of your social fabric, and introduce into your country the conditions now prevailing in Russia."

Who does not remember the recent conduct of Joffe? I regret that this creature bears a name so nearly identical with that of the great hero of France, who must be tempted to change his name and adopt some other appellation. Joffe is the Bolshevik ambassador to Berlin appointed pursuant to the treaty of Brest-Litovsk and recognized as a matter of course by the German Government. With the liberation of Liebknecht from his prison, Joffe began his Bolshevik propaganda among the people of Germany. He became so offensive, and went to such extremes in his advocacy of fire and sword, death and destruction, that the Ebert provisional government ordered his deportation from the country. Why, Mr. President, the Bolsheviki are serving Germany in France and England and America as efficiently as German secret service ever did. A recent article in the New York Times, of January 7, by the Times's correspondent in Paris declares:

In well-informed circles here the feeling grows daily stronger that bolshevism is one of the greatest dangers with which the allied conference must cope. The mass of the public does not yet realize the full extent of the danger, as the newspapers avoid alarming news on the one hand and on the other are overready to feature exaggerated stories emphasizing the utter disorganization and ruin of the Bolshevist régime in Russia.

Yet those who know the "secrets of the gods" in Paris no longer disguise their alarm at the course of events in Europe. Holland, Spain, and Switzerland are seriously menaced by labor troubles. Stockholm is overtly the headquarters of the Bolshevist propaganda, whose funds amount to millions of dollars as a result of unprincipled speculation by henchmen of Lenine and Trotzky on the ruble exchange and in Russian oil and other industrial shares whose variations they can influence at will.

Even in France, England, and Italy there are disquieting symptoms whereof the dissatisfaction over the demobilization question is not the sole manifestation. In Germany the Spartacists grow daily more dangerous, powerful, and daring, and while the allies are hair splitting over the conference procedure and the exact significance of the league of nations the Bolshevist flood rolls steadily westward across Poland.

What is really happening in that direction may be judged by a leading editorial in the Swiss Journal de Geneve, whose neutral impartiality can not conceal its profound anxiety. The writer says:

"The Russian Bolsheviki are advancing. They have reconstituted an army of mercenaries very well paid, and, it is said, organized and disciplined. Its numbers, reckoned by its adversaries as high as 2,000,000, are, perhaps, exaggerated; but at least they are sufficient to move almost without meeting resistance on the footsteps of the retreating Germans.

"All the populations of western Russia, Lithuanians, White Russians, etc., are falling, one after the other, into the power of triumphant anarchy. Now Poland is threatened. The aid promised by the allies is not forthcoming, and the Poles are hard pressed on all sides by Ruthenians and Bolsheviki, without its being possible to determine the unique and mysterious hand which certainly is maneuvering their host of enemies.

"The internal situation of the country is hardly less threatening. Ravaged by the Germans in an unparalleled fashion, Poland has no longer a single machine or single plow. Her industrial cities are thronged by a starving mass of Russian prisoners, Polish workers dismissed by the Germans, and retiring German troops scouring the country of its last reserves of food like a plague of locusts. Disorder, pillage, riot, and murder are the order of the day.

The remainder of this article, which is very short, I ask to have incorporated in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"The Polish Government is faced by well-nigh insurmountable difficulties. Its chief, Gen. Pilsudski, is unsupported by the allies, and his efforts are hampered by a committee of people who for four years have not set foot in Poland. Czechs, Jugo-Slavs, and other exiles in the entente countries have returned home, but the Poles alone continue to create in Paris difficulties for the Government of their country. Meanwhile anarchy rises and grows more serious.

"And what is Germany's attitude in this turmoil? It is hard to say. While the Poles are accusing the Germans of favoring bolshevism in Poland and break off diplomatic relations on that account, the Germans, for their part, dread the Bolshevist danger which the neighborhood of Poland represents to them. At the moment when, despite all assertions to the contrary, Liebknecht grows every day stronger and more menacing, Poland is for Germany a peril no less social than national.

"In any case Europe's interest is evident—to save Poland and in order to save it to strengthen the hand of its Government, for bolshevism is not a force that can be checked with ease. To-day it is at Minsk, perhaps to-morrow at Vilna. When it shall have triumphed at Warsaw and Cracow can it be prevented from reaching Berlin and Vienna? And then what will become of all of us—allies and neutrals alike?"

The despairing appeal of the last sentence, coming as it does from one of the soberest and most reliable newspapers in Europe, whose friendship to the entente cause has been unswerving throughout the war, should be enough to open the eyes of the allied leaders to the danger of further talk without action and further temporization and delay.

Mr. THOMAS. I might read a similar communication from the Paris correspondent of the New York World, on the 9th day of January, and of similar import; but I will not detain the Senate by doing so.

While bolshevism is arrayed against the property-holding class, and while its avowed purpose is to endow a very small segment of people with all of the power of organized society, while it proposes to abolish selfishness and cupidity, it recruits its army of mercenaries, and holds it in leash by paying wages hitherto unknown in military history. One of the greatest inducements to war, through all the stages of civilization, has been the cupidity of the soldier, the prospect of plunder, of loot, of rapine. The acquisition of property and of goods by conquest instead of labor has attracted the cupidity of the world from time immemorial; and the Bolsheviki are utilizing precisely the elements for the dissolution of the social compact which the allied countries propose to disarm by a league to enforce peace. Their soldiers receive from 250 to 450 rubles a month. Having looted the treasure of 180,000,000 of people, being in control of their industrial forces, operating through the Soviets, they have no difficulty in securing sufficient funds for their army and their emissaries engaged in the work of instigating riot and revolution in other countries. This explains the expansion of the Bolsheviki army, an army of mercenaries, well paid and encouraged to plunder and loot at home and abroad.

These creatures are creating dissension among the allies now gathered at Paris for the reestablishment of peace. They are directed by the cunning German hand, so potent for mischief when working in secret. Bolshevik emissaries, with ample funds, spin their webs and weave their toils as German brains suggest and German hands direct. An "ex-attaché" has recently informed us through the columns of the Washington Post that Prince Von Bulow, the greatest chancellor that Kaiser Wilhelm ever had, and one of the greatest and most unscrupulous intellects of time, was in charge of Bolshevik propaganda; that his master hand in intrigue is easily recognized by those familiar with his methods in all of the dissolving forces and influences now so active in Paris, in every country in the world. Germany is seeking, under cover of bolshevism, to undo the power of the allies through agencies more dangerous than her armies ever were, for they are organized not only but subtle and unseen.

What bolshevism has done for Russia through German agencies it may do elsewhere. And bolshevism calls itself democracy. One of the first acts of this democratic organization was to disperse the Duma, which had been elected under the Kerensky régime which revealed an overwhelming anti-Bolshevik majority in its attempted organization. It was dispersed with bayonets the day succeeding its meeting; it never has been permitted to reconvene, and bolshevism has made no attempt to ascertain the will of the great majority in Russia either through the processes of an election or otherwise.

In fact, Mr. President, bolshevism in Russia has been one long agony of murder, of pillage, of destruction. It has attracted to its ranks all the criminals, the idlers, the adventurers, and the outcasts of the Empire. Murder and all the crimes of the category are sanctified in the Bolshevist declaration of faith. It is an inverted autocracy. Composed of numbers of many instead of one, it is far more atrocious and far more demoralizing and far more cruel than Czardom ever was.

Mr. President, the French Revolution has ever been regarded as the most awful episode of blood and carnage in human history, and down to the accession of Bolshevik power in Europe that was true. No one doubts the awful character of the French Revolution, nor yet that it was largely justified by the events of preceding centuries. The guillotine was said to be active in Paris, during the days of Rebespierre and Marat, by day and by night. It counted its victims every moment; and yet, Mr. President, the total number of men and women sacrificed to the guillotine during the French Revolution was less than 4,000. My friend from Utah [Mr. KING] says it was 2,700. But the Bolsheviki in Petrograd in a single day last fall murdered 860 human beings; and if all the victims of its reign of terror could be enumerated they would doubtless reach into the hundreds of thousands. There is no similar period of organized butchery known to history.

The French Revolution, too, had an organized government. It was a forceful government. It was a government which in large degree respected life and property. Its terrors were waged against practically a single and a very small class, the nobility, which had oppressed and trodden underfoot the common people of France for centuries. Even so, Mr. President, the reaction from its horrors resulted in the downfall of Robespierre, and in the emergence of Napoleon from its wrack and ruin. France, drunk with blood and reeling under the weight of a task it could not accomplish, threw herself into the arms of a usurper, and abandoned her ideals for the glories of world dominion. And when bolshevism shall have run its bloody course, Russia, stricken and despairing, may welcome a deliverer albeit he may rescue her from its infernal clutch only to rivet her chains of servitude more securely than before.

I have stated my view regarding what our attitude toward Russia should be. Summarized, I contend that we should rescue the Czecho-Slovaks west of Lake Baikal at whatever cost; second, that we should safeguard until we can remove the property of the allies at the ports of the Pacific and of the northern ocean; and, lastly, that we should determine upon some policy toward an international condition more menacing in its consequences than any which our civilization has confronted. If we have overthrown the Kaiser only that bolshevism shall wax in power then it were better that an all-conquering Kaiser had spread his dominions over every land. His was a government infinitely preferable to the enthronement of the criminal clements of society, devoted to the destruction of life and the confiscation of property everywhere, without trial, without investigation, without appeal. I shall never believe that after paying the price which autocracy's overthrow demanded America will fail to measure up to the more supreme duty of the hour and take this hideous monstrosity by the throat and strangle it forever.

What is bolshevism? It is hard to describe in adequate language what is meant by that term. The recent Dutch minister from Holland to Russia, who barely escaped with his life, and who has made an impassioned plea for allied intervention as a duty to civilization, in an interview in the London Times said:

I wish to give a solemn warning to the working classes of all nations. Bolshevism, I say without exaggeration, is the end of civilization. I have known Russia intimately for 20 years and never have the working classes of Russia suffered as they are suffering at the present moment. I have never seen or dreamed of the possibility of such corruption, tyranny, and the absence of all semblance of freedom as there are in Russia at the present moment.

Translated into practice, the five points of bolshevism really come to this: (1) High wages; (2) do not work; (3) take other people's property; (4) no punishment; (5) no taxation; and I suppose there will always be a certain number of people who will adopt a program which in practice amounts to this. That is why, having myself seen the disastrous effects of this policy on all classes of society, I take the first opportunity on my arrival in England to warn the public. The bulk of the workmen in Russia are to-day far and away worse off than they ever have been, and the state of unemployment is simply terrible. When I left Petrograd the situation was one of utter starvation, and most people hardly knew how they would exist through the following day. The future to me seems hopeless. One thing is certain, that, left as she now is, Russia will be in a state of utter and complete ruin. Wherever bolshevism rules the nation has been beaten to a pulp and is utterly helpless.

I have said that this movement appeals to the predatory instincts of the criminal class, and I will venture the assertion that there is no so-called Bolshevist organization in any country in the world that is not welcomed by its criminals, by the man who would cut his neighbor's throat for a nickel or burn his neighbor's house for pastime. Bolshevism is destruction enthroned against a civilization that is entirely constructive, and if it succeeds it means relapse into a condition of absolute and primitive barbarism.

Mr. President, Russia is the center from which all governments, as I have said, are being attacked. I want to call attention to a few significant and sinister circumstances in support of that assertion.

I have here an extract from the New York World of January 9, which states the policy of the so-called Spartacus Bund, which is the name of the organization in Germany.

The Spartacus Bund is a group of direct-action Socialists determined to carry on the class struggle of the working classes against the bourgeoise until a Government is established by and for the working classes, excluding all others from participation. It represents the great mass of the proletariat, not only in Germany but in the entire world.

WORLD-WIDE PLANS.

The revolution it is carrying on in Germany is only a step toward the world-wide revolution, which is to end in the universal establishment of dictature by the proletariat. Class struggle must be carried to the point where government by the proletariat masses shall be so thoroughly established that it can crush resistance. The proletariat of all countries must be united, and it must rule the world.

The immediate objects of the Spartacus Bund in Germany were outlined by the recent Spartacus Congress. What the Spartacus Bund proposes to do follows:

It will disarm all the police, all the soldiers, and all others not belonging to the proletariat. It will deprive the ruling classes of all arms and make resistance impossible. It will take control of all arms and ammunition plants in the name of the Arbeiter-Soldatenrat and arm all workmen devoted to the cause of the proletariat as a workmen's militia.

A red guard will be constructed from the proletariat as an active militia to fight counter-revolution. Discipline imposed by officers and under officers will be removed, substituting the free disposition of the soldiers, thus putting an end to military caste. All officers and their adherents will be removed from the soldiers' soviets.

The old administration will be replaced by one true to the cause of the proletariat.

A revolutionary tribunal will be established, before which will be tried the men chiefly guilty of causing and prolonging the war. This list will include both the Hohenzollerns, Ludendorff, Hindenburg, Tirpitz, and all their accomplices, as well as counter-revolutionists.

If the purpose were confined to the last recital, I do not know that the world would seriously object; but, unfortunately, bolshevism perceives no distinction between the world-wide criminal who deserves punishment and the peaceful citizen who happens to have a clean collar and 10 cents in his pocket.

Politically the purpose of the Spartacus Bund has been to put an end to the federation of States and to substitute a single German Socialist republic, the Arbeiter-Soldatenrat, to take over all parliamentary functions and all State functions except those originating in that body.

Election to public office and to parliament will be confined to soldiers and workmen, and there will be the right of instant recall of representatives. A central committee will be constituted by the Arbeiter Soldatenrat for the exercise of executive power. There will be absolute socialization of the State, with a six-hour day and unemployment insurance.

God have mercy upon the company which takes the risks or the Government that may be called upon to assume them.

I have another clipping, which I shall not read, Mr. President, because I have already spoken longer than I intended, but which indicates the class of individuals, and those alone, who will be permitted to exercise any power or enjoy any rights of citizenship. It consists solely of those who do not employ anybody for anything. If I ask John Smith to curry my horse for wages I instantly disqualify myself from the right of citizenship. If a man employs another to do anything, however needful, however helpful to the employee, he writes his sentence of political death under the Bolshevist régime and is excluded from this choice band of thieves and scoundrels by virtue of that simple fact. This, they say, is carrying to its logical sequence the doctrine of the rule of the proletariat, and I am inclined to think that is true. It surely demonstrates the utter hollowness, tragedy, and impossibility of the Bolshevist scheme.

Mr. President, I have said that Russia is the center from which all Governments are being attacked. The attacking forces are operating in America actively, operating quite as freely as in countries across the sea. They have been identified with our industrial life for some time through an organization known as the I. W. W.; and it is a significant fact that nearly all of the prominent leaders of bolshevism in Russia, Lenine excepted, graduated from eastern New York, from Chicago, from Philadelphia, and from Buffalo, and every mother's son of them were members of the Industrial Workers of the World.

We are told by the press in the last few days that the Bolsheviki are organizing soviets in our large cities and that two, I believe, already exist in New York, and others are forming or are to be formed in Chicago, San Francisco, and Seattle. This means the establishment in free America of organizations whose avowed object and purpose are to agitate for the overthrow of this Government. It means, if it is permitted to be, that these scoundrels and expatriates from Russia, in combination with other scoundrels and criminals in this country, may organize with impunity for the propagation and practice of treason. It means that these centers of pernicious activity are to become the rallying points and nurseries of the I. W. W. When we consider the vast range of the criminal population of the great centers of this country, men who live by crime, and who will flock to these organized points under the rallying cry of "Brotherhood and the proletariat," disseminating their doctrines upon every street corner under the plea of freedom of speech, and the temptations which they offer to the unscrupulous, the unemployed, and the dissatisfied, we may readily perceive that here will be fruitful ground for this terrible menace to civilization.

I predict that unless the Government of the United States in cooperation with the States, in their sovereign capacity, shall stamp out these organizations and punish those who dare thus to menace the integrity of our institutions and advocate the overthrow of our Government the scenes of Petrograd and Moscow will be repeated on the shores of Lake Michigan and the island of Manhattan. How much further they will spread God only knows; but I am convinced that there is no duty to-day confronting the people of the United States, the American Congress, and the legislatures of our Commonwealths more imperative than this to which I am now calling attention.

Mr. President, only a few days ago a terrible riot—a so-called labor riot—developed in the Republic of Argentina. It was so formidable in its dimensions that the army was mobilized, the President for the time being surrendered his functions to the commander in chief, and the military power of the Republic was invoked to quell the insurrection. Two hundred and fifty lives were lost and some 750 persons were wounded, many of whom will die. It now appears that this entire trouble was fomented and engineered by Russian Bolshevists from Petrograd and Moscow, and that Uruguay would have been involved in the uprising but for the rigor of its authorities.

MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY, January 12, 1918.

The police have uncovered a plot on the part of Russians to instigate a Bolshevik movement here and in Buenos Aires. Four of the leaders in the movement are said to have confessed their participation in a plan to overthrow the Uruguayan and Argentine Governments and institute soviets in both countries. The police by quick work prevented an outbreak here which had been arranged to occur simultaneously with that in Buenos Aires.

The director of the "cultured center" is Isaac Molinoff, a Russian, who is said by the Buenos Aires police authorities to have been an accessory in a bomb-throwing plot in the Colon Opera House several years ago. Since that time Molinoff had lived here. He was arrested during the general strike last August, charged with carrying explosives.

FREED AFTER SHORT SENTENCE.

He pleaded that he was taking the bomb to sea to destroy it. He was given a short sentence and recently was released from custody. It is said that Molinoff since his release has been engaged in Bolshevist propaganda.

Among those arrested with Molinoff are Moses Federmann, Numann Patulyoski, and Marcos Mirnovich. Federmann, questioned by the police, is reported to have said that an anarchist revolution could not be long delayed in Uruguay, and that he would establish a soviet government along the lines of Nikolai Lenine. He is alleged to have said that he did not believe the arrest of the ringleaders in the present movement would hinder the ultimate success of the plan.

Patulyoski told the police that he had come to Montevideo from propaganda work in Buenos Aires in order to aid in the local movement. He said he knew Molinoff in Russia, where Molinoff had been active in propaganda work.

Another serious disturbance, formidable in its proportions, has just broken out in Peru. I have no particle of doubt that it has been fomented by the same pernicious influences, and that these will continue to occur until the strong hand of the Governments shall be unsparingly exercised against them.

I have referred to the I. W. W. It is beyond controversy that this criminal organization was a potent agency for German intrigue and German crime prior to America's entrance into the great war. There is no question that the 20 or 30 men affiliating with it who have been convicted were properly convicted, and that, considering their menace to this country in time of war, their sentences were not extravagant. But now that the war is over this organization is again beginning its activities and the exercise of its deviltry. It is the original and will continue to be one of the agencies of the Bolshevik propaganda in the United States.

I have read from a newspaper clipping the purpose of the Bolsheviki in Germany. I now read the preamble, or statement, of the I. W. W. principle:

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among the millions of working people and the few who make up the employing class have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists but to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

Its methods are thus set forth by its historian:

As a revolutionary organization the Industrial Workers of the World aims to use any and all tactics that will get the results sought with the least expenditure of time and energy. The tactics used are determined solely by the power of the organization to make good in their use. The question of "right" and "wrong" does not concern us.

This organization is tolerated in many parts of this country. It boasts of apologists and admirers. Some regard it as one of a natural sequence of our disturbed and altogether unsatisfactory social and industrial condition. It may be, Mr. President; but it is a matter of great satisfaction to me to know that the American Federation of Labor repudiates it and that it denounces all labor organizations recognizing and operating under the wage system. I know individually some of the leaders of this organization. I know their purpose to be identically the purpose of Russian bolshevism. There is no difference. "Direct action" is their watchword, which means kill, burn, destroy, assassinate. Before the war in some of the States upon the Pacific coast juries dared not punish these people for their crimes, because over their heads hung the constant threat and menace of the organization. In the section from which I hail that condition at one time came very near being the established fact. This means that unless the citizenship of the country are protected by their Government and by counter organization the criminals that constitute these organizations will increase in numbers, in terrorism, and in menace to our established institutions.

Mr. President, just a word, and I am through.

I do not believe that a disorder of this kind can be destroyed by penal legislation, however rigidly enforced. There is much unrest in the world. There is a widespread and largely justified dissatisfaction with the existing industrial, social, and economic conditions. The complaints against the oppression of trusts, combinations, and organized capital are in many instances unfortunately only too well founded. There can be such a thing as bolshevism in high life, depriving men by illegitimate combinations through legal processes of their property without taking their lives, perhaps more pernicious in their consequences than violent assaults upon human life and property.

No man can deny the Bolshevist's argument when he says that but for the despotism of the Romanoffs there would be no Bolshevists, although it is but partly true. Nor can we deny that the Industrial Workers of the World is the offspring of the railroad wrecker and the monopolist. The leading industrial, commercial, and financial forces of this country, recognizing the perils confronting society, must abandon practices and policies engendering these conditions and conform the economic life of the Nation to the lines of equity and of justice. This, more than codes and correctives, will promote tranquility and deprive anarchism of its only refuge.

I had thought, Mr. President, that with the affliction of a world war, the magnificent response the American people have made to all consequent demands upon them, the transient extinction of class differences, the prevalence of a true spirit of democratic sacrifice and cooperation, the predatory outrages of financial power would terminate during the interval of strife. But, unfortunately, Mr. President, I was overoptimistic. Some of them have occurred during the war, whose excitements have served to make their perpetuation easy; others are in process.

A great railroad in my State, the Denver & Rio Grande, one of the most prosperous systems in the United States prior to the war, is to-day in hopeless, irredeemable bankruptcy. Its stockholders have lost virtually their entire investment through no fault of their own. A few years ago this stock commanded from $80 to $85 a share upon the market. To-day there is no market for it whatever. The road has been looted, wrecked, robbed, and destroyed by as heartless and conscienceless a combination of bankers and capitalists as ever coveted a prosperous and desirable property. Strange to say, they have accomplished this object by utilizing its obligations to another railroad, which they also captured for a song, and then used the guaranty of the Rio Grande for its destruction. When the history of this incident shall be understood by the people of the United States they will perceive in it a bolshevism as dangerous to American institutions and to the integrity of our civilization as that of Lenine and Trotzky at the other end of the social system.

No, Mr. President, there is much to do besides legislation. We must recognize and remove, as far as we can, the evils and the abuses which are the sole possible defenses for this unfortunate and dangerous situation.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to offer a few remarks upon the Knox resolution, which was presented some time ago by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania.

The principal object of the Knox resolution is contained in the third paragraph thereof, which reads as follows:

That any project for any general league of nations or for any sweeping change in the ancient laws of the sea as hitherto recognized as international law and violated by the Teutonic powers should be postponed for separate consideration not alone by the victorious belligerents but by all the nations, if and when at some future time general conferences on those subjects might be deemed useful.

The present war has been the most disastrous of any in the history of the world. It is estimated that over 7,000,000 men have been killed and that over 15,000,000 men have been disabled or wounded. It has been calculated that the cost of the war, including the destruction of property, has amounted to more than $200,000,000,000, in consequence of which bonds have been or will be issued by the various nations involved which it will be impossible to liquidate for more than a hundred years. It is safe to say that no wars are remunerative, even to those nations that are victorious.

The United States at all times has recognized the horrors of war and sought in every way to avoid engaging in conflict. Not until ruthless disregard by Germany of the principles of international law in sinking American ships and destroying American lives did we make our declaration of the existence of a state of war. The United States has at all times in the past been among the foremost of nations to encourage the formation of arbitration tribunals for the settlement of international disputes and the making of agreements to mitigate the brutalities of war. In the interest of humanity and civilization it has always been the purpose of the United States to form some kind of covenant with all or the leading nations of the world to prevent the recurrence of war which ruthlessly exterminate so much of the youth and flower of our land and which places a burden of crushing taxation upon the countries of the world. It must be remembered that this burden rests mostly upon labor, as wealth is nothing but accumulated labor. It has taken just such frightful results as are unfolded to our view to demonstrate the necessity of avoiding war, to make people consider seriously some method of averting future visitation of such catastrophes. It is said that the Napoleonic wars, by reason of the death and disabling of so many of the stalwart soldiers, reduced in the following generations the average height of the men of some large districts of Europe as much as 2 inches. Our policy has produced a nation of wealth, power, and intelligent citizenship which is unequaled in the history of the world.

The question presented by the Knox resolution is whether, when these evils are vividly before us and when all of the world is appealing for some measure to prevent such terrible recurrences, we should proceed with the peace negotiations and not consider at this time any proposition concerning a league of nations, by which such horrors might be avoided. The resolution bears upon the face of it an opposition to any such league. It states that the subject "should be postponed for separate consideration, not alone by the victorious belligerents but by all the nations, if and when at some future time general conferences on those subjects might be deemed useful." It suggests no time when such conferences shall be held; it casts doubt upon the propriety of ever holding them when it says, "if and when at some future time general conferences on those subjects might be deemed useful."

Mr. President, there are two ways of defeating the plan for a league of nations: First, by openly opposing and voting against it; and, second, by postponing its consideration to a time when other subjects are engrossing the attention of the world and when there may exist divisions and disputes among nations which might destroy any chance of effecting an agreement. In my judgment, to vote for the Knox resolution proposing postponement is virtually to vote against the formation of any league of nations for the purpose of avoiding wars.

One of the principal reasons for our entering the war was to bring about such a compact with other nations as would insure the peace of the world forever. That was the statement made by the President to the Senate and House of Representatives at the time of our entrance into the war. No dissent was made to that declaration by Senators or Representatives, but all enthusiastically applauded the sentiment. We have said time and again that if such a result is obtained it will compensate us for the great loss of life and property occasioned by this disastrous war. Every Senator or Representative who has addressed citizens of our country in favor of the various liberty loans has dwelt upon this as one of our highest aims. Is it possible that anyone with fairness can now in an indirect manner propose the abandonment of that, the greatest argument we had in getting the approval of the people of the United States to subscribe to gigantic loans for the prosecution of the war?

In the past the principal retarding influence in the creation of a league of nations has been the fear on our part that the court or arbitration body would be so dominated in the interest of the monarchies of Europe that we might be swept into the monarchial system instead of having prevail the just principles of the rights of humanity as set forth in our Declaration of Independence. It was the apprehension that we might be at a disadvantage in submitting our disputes with other nations to a tribunal composed of judges the majority of whom would in all likelihood be from monarchies.

The continued discussion of the formation of a league of nations has developed many proposals for the determination of international disputes. In order to induce nations to enter into such a league it is necessary to avoid giving any advantage to one nation over another in the trial of such causes.

Mr. President, I have always believed that there should be established an international court to which all controversies threatening war between nations must be submitted; that the judges thereof should not be selected for the determination of all disputes presented, but should sit only in those cases to which they may be assigned; that each nation should have at the court as many judges as it deemed proper to appoint to act as a panel from which to select those who are to pass upon each international question; and that when a dispute threatening war arises between any two nations each nation, after the formulation of the pleadings, should select an equal number of judges of its own if it so desires, and those so chosen to select the odd judge of the court, and if they can not agree upon the odd judge, then, if no other way can be devised, they shall resort to chance in the selection of such odd judge. Even if, in the selection of the odd judge, an advantage should be obtained by one side, it would be inconsiderable when weighed with the destruction of life and property of each nation in case of war.

A court so constituted would be regarded by all nations as fair, and thus the first great requisite of a successful arbitration tribunal would be accomplished. Under those conditions all of the nations would find security in the league which would prevent many, if not all, wars, and consequently they would likely be willing to enter into such a league.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator may intend discussing at a later part of his speech the point concerning which I was about to interrogate him, and, if he does so intend, I shall be very glad to have him so inform me.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I shall be glad to have the statement of the Senator.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator contemplate a system which would require that all who are parties to the convention or league of peace, whatever form it assumes, shall submit to it every question affecting the vital interests or the honor or territorial integrity of each nation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not as to territorial integrity. My idea concerning an agreement as to the territorial integrity is this: I believe there ought to be specified in the peace treaty we are negotiating the boundaries of each nation, and we should stipulate that those boundaries, except as modified by mutual agreement of each nation interested, with the consent of the inhabitants of each, shall be respected and protected by the nations to the league. That, in my judgment, would do away with nine-tenths of the wars of the world, because territorial acquisition has been the bone of contention and has been the aim of nations who desired conquest more than any other cause. I have no doubt that nine-tenths of the nations of the world that have been fighting have had their causes originate from a desire to obtain the territory of some other nation.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that upon the part of those who are discussing this question the terms justiciable and non-justiciable are employed?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. KING. Accepting the terminology and the definition so given, is the Senator willing to have our Nation join a league of nations which would require that we should submit to the league of nations, for instance, the Monroe doctrine, the question of tariffs, and other vital questions, some of which would be entirely nonjusticiable?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I must say that it would depend somewhat upon the controversy which was presented. But my desire is as near as possible to submit all questions that arise in controversies between nations. I will cover that, if the Senator will allow me, a little further on, and probably a little more clearly. The Monroe doctrine will not be jeopardized by a league of nations to enforce peace, but will be made more secure by the guaranty of all the nations instead of by ours alone. If the United States should have a dispute with Belgium, that kingdom could well say that it has as good a chance of winning the controversy against the great United States as would be the chance of our own Government, and we, desiring no acquisition of territory and desiring nothing but what is right and just, would be glad to accept the terms of arbitration and select our judges of the court which would determine the controversy. We could not refuse, unless we were to exercise those very qualities of domination of great nations over smaller nations which we have so unanimously condemned in this war. With the full confidence on the part of both Belgium and the United States that the tribunal would be fair, both would submit, knowing that the determination in the judgment of the majority of a tribunal so formed would be in the interest of the orderly administration of justice. The first great requisite in the formation of a league of nations for the prevention of wars is, in my judgment, the establishment of a court so constituted.

Mr. President, the difference between that kind of a court and a court of fixed judges named by the league or named by all the nations to determine all controversies that come before it is the difference between night and day as to whether the arbitration will be regarded as fair. In other words, we have our doubts whether, if we have but one judge upon the tribunal and the monarchies of Europe have seven or eight, we will not be engulfed in the influence of those judges appointed from monarchial governments. Consequently the fear has been that we will not get justice. If we were sure that we would get justice there would be no difficulty in agreeing to almost any proposition for a league of nations that might be presented; but where you agree that the court which determines the matter shall consist of judges selected by your own Government and judges selected by the opposing Government, and that those judges shall meet and determine and agree upon a third or fifth or seventh or ninth judge, dependent upon the size of the court, you can readily see that all nations will agree to come into a league that will have for its court such an organization. They will then know that their chances are equal, and that while there might be some advantage obtained by one nation over another in the selection of the odd judge, it would be inconsiderable compared to the great damage and wrong and death and destruction that must result from these wars.

As to the manner in which the decrees of the court shall be enforced there are many differences of opinion; some believe that its decrees should be enforced by such a great army and navy of its own as would make resistance by one nation futile. This, of course, would involve an agreement among the nations to reduce their armies and navies far below those provided for the international tribunal. If successful, the tribunal would prevent the enormous burdens upon the people which are now made necessary in order that each nation may be prepared for conflicts. Unless some agreement among the nations is made providing for compulsory submission of controversies to an international court, the powers of the world will compete more sharply than they have in the past in the enlargement of armies and navies. That policy will produce not only great burdens but will breed in each nation warlike tendencies and autocratic attitude in the exercise of its powers.

Others believe that the league of nations should simply exercise a moral influence against the entrance of nations into war or that by hindrance and delays such a length of time might elapse that the passions of each nation would subside and reason induce each to forego the declaration of hostilities.

There are objections to these contentions for the enforcement of the decrees of the court, but that some measure should be adopted which would prevent many, if not all, wars it seems to me clear. If nothing more results from the peace treaty than that each nation agrees to respect the territorial boundaries as fixed in the treaty and to aid in maintaining such territorial integrity, nine-tenths of the wars of the world will be prevented. As soon as a nation obsessed with the idea of conquest knows that it must fight the entire world if it attempts to seize territory, it will conclude that nothing is to be gained by an aggressive course and abandon such schemes. Nine-tenths of the wars of the world have been started for the purpose of acquiring territory, and if such an agreement were made by all the nations of the world it would eliminate nine-tenths of the wars of the world. Germany has been the one nation of all others to decline to enter into an international agreement for arbitration of controversies and now, in the formation of the peace treaty, we have a right to compel her to keep the peace by some such contract; whereas if the matter is delayed there is no way of requiring her to enter into such an agreement. It is therefore imperative, to my mind, that an international agreement, which will at least tend to prevent war in the future, should be considered and agreed upon before the peace treaty is concluded. There are others who believe that the decree of the court should be enforced, if necessary, by the army and navy of each of the signatory powers.

Mr. President, we heard a very eloquent speech to-day from the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] condemning that form of an international agreement. He said that there would be a competition by each nation endeavoring to get as great an army and navy as possible in order to preserve the peace of the world. He overlooked the fact that in that same agreement for the arbitration of controversies it can be stipulated and agreed that there shall be no enlargement of the armies and navies of the nations, or a limitation of the armaments can be specified and fixed according to population of the respective nations or by such other means and such other ways as may be devised. With an agreement of that kind I see no reason why that competition would exist which the Senator fears, but it will exist if no league of nations is agreed upon.

There are some who believe that the decrees of the court should not be enforced except by an agreement that a nation refusing or failing to submit a controversy to the international court should be punished by certain commercial restrictions imposed by all the nations of the world. Others contend that a nation refusing to submit a controversy with another nation to the international court should not recover against the other nation any indemnity. Such a rule, of course, would place the nation refusing to submit its controversy to arbitration at a disadvantage and likely to cause it to refrain from a declaration of war. To those who say it would be futile to simply agree to submit all controversies threatening war to an international court and abide by the result because some nations might regard such treaties as mere scraps of paper, it may be said that the results from treating the Belgian treaty as a scrap of paper would likely prevent any nation in the future breaking a treaty with all the nations of the world.

While I believe in some of the more drastic means of enforcing the decrees of the court, yet any of the means suggested would be better than no agreement.

President Wilson is now in Europe endeavoring to negotiate a peace treaty that will not only settle the disputes as to the nations in this war but that will at least have a tendency to prevent wars in the future. As we have said so many times that we are fighting for a permanent peace among the nations of the world, that this is a war to end all wars, it seems to be inconsistent with our own declarations when we advise that he make no treaty with respect to the world's peace. He knows the situation and views of the nations and as to whether we can get a treaty that will insure peace to the world better than we who have no communication with the representatives of other nations. It may be that he will not accomplish the thing which we all desire, namely, making the world safe from wars, but we impair his influence if we pass resolutions urging that he should not endeavor to consummate such purpose at the most opportune time. Now is the psychological moment to produce such an agreement, and if there is anyone in the United States who can produce such a happy result it is the President, who, as the demonstrations in Europe show, is held not only in the highest regard but in the greatest affection by the people of the entente powers. To impose our advice on him when we are not familiar with the situation, it seems to me, is a proceeding which would greatly weaken his influence in the negotiation of the treaty. It, therefore, in my judgment, would be the height of impropriety to pass the Knox resolution.

THE CENSUS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] on page 8.

Mr. SHEPPARD. After consulting further with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] I have prepared an amendment to be offered in lieu of the amendment which I presented yesterday afternoon and which is now pending. I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], which the Secretary will state, as perfected by that Senator.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 7, on page 8, line 20, after the word "act," it is proposed to insert the following:

And provided further, That in the selection of the additional clerks and employees provided for by section 6, the director is authorized to use, so far as practicable, the reemployment registers established by Executive order of November 29, 1918, so far as the same applies to permanent appointments by competition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Census was, in section 8, page 9, line 10, after the word "home," to insert "whether or not a survivor of any war in which the United States has been engaged, and if so, of what war," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 8. That the Fourteenth Census shall be restricted to inquiries relating to population, to agriculture, to manufactures, to forestry and forest products, and to mines and quarries. The schedules relating to population shall include for each inhabitant the name, place of abode, relationship to head of family, color, sex, age, conjugal condition, place of birth, place of birth of parents, nationality or mother tongue of all persons born in foreign countries, nationality or mother tongue of parents of foreign birth, number of years in the United States, citizenship, occupation, whether or not employer or employee, whether or not engaged in agriculture, school attendance, literacy, and tenure of home, whether or not a survivor of any war in which the United States has been engaged, and if so, of what war, and the name and address of each blind or deaf and dumb person.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, in line 2, after the word "manufactures," to insert "to forestry and forest products," so as to make the clause read:

The schedules of inquiries relating to manufactures, to forestry and forest products, and to mines and quarries shall include the name and location of each establishment; character of organization, whether individual, corporate, or other form; character of business or kind of goods manufactured; amount of capital actually invested; number of proprietors, firm members, copartners and officers, and the amount of their salaries; number of employees and the amount of their wages; quantity and cost of materials used in manufactures; principal miscellaneous expenses; quantity and value of products; time in operation during the year; character and quantity of power used; and character and number of machines employed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, in line 14, after the word "manufactures," to insert "of forestry and forest products," so as to make the clause read:

The census of manufactures, of forestry and forest products, and of mines and quarries shall relate to the year ending December 31 next preceding the enumeration of population, and shall be confined to manufacturing establishments and mines and quarries which were in active operation during all or a portion of that year. The census of manufactures shall furthermore be confined to manufacturing establishments conducted under what is known as the factory system, exclusive of the so-called neighborhood, household, and hand industries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 6, before the word "determined," to strike out "The form and subdivision of inquiries necessary to obtain the information under the foregoing topics shall be" and insert "The number, form, and subdivision of inquiries provided for in section 8 shall be," so as to make the clause read:

The number, form, and subdivision of inquiries provided for in section 8 shall be determined by the Director of the Census.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 11, line 18, after the words "by the," to strike out "Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census" and insert "President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That the Director of the Census shall, at least six months prior to the date fixed for commencing the enumeration at the Fourteenth and each succeeding decennial census, designate the number, whether one or more, of supervisors of census for each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, and shall define the districts within which they are to act; except that the Director of the Census, in his discretion, need not designate supervisors for Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, but in lieu thereof may employ special agents as hereinafter provided. The supervisors shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided, That the whole number of supervisors shall not exceed 400: Provided further, That so far as practicable and desirable the boundaries of the supervisors' districts shall conform to the boundaries of the congressional districts: And provided further, That if in any supervisor's district the supervisor has not been appointed and qualified 90 days preceding the date fixed for the commencement of the enumeration, or if any vacancy shall occur thereafter, either through death, removal, or resignation of a supervisor, or from any other cause, the Director of the Census may appoint a temporary supervisor or detail an employee of the Census Office to act as supervisor for that district.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment go over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 13, on page 13.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in lines 11, 12, and 13, on page 13, I move to strike out the words "and in addition thereto $1 for each thousand or major fraction of a thousand of population enumerated in his district, such sums," so that the section, if amended, will read:

SEC. 11. That each supervisor of the census shall, upon the completion of his duties to the satisfaction of the Director of the Census, receive the sum of $1,500, to be in full compensation for all services rendered and expenses incurred by him—

And so forth.

It seems to me that the sum of $1,500 provided in the section is ample for the few days' work that will be required at the hands of the enumerators.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, this is compensation for the supervisors, I will say to the Senator, and not for the enumerators. The work of the supervisors lasts for five or six months and sometimes longer. This is the compensation that was provided 10 years ago when the Thirteenth Census was taken. No change from the provision then enacted has been made in the present bill, and I do not think that the Senator ought to insist upon his amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in reply I will say that if experience has demonstrated that $1,500 is inadequate compensation we ought to provide in the bill an amount that will be sufficient and fair. It seems to me that to leave it in this indefinite way is not the wisest and best method of legislation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is the method that has commended itself to the experts who prepared the bill originally and who made examination of the entire situation with a view to seeing what changes, if any, should be made. It was their view, the view of the House committee, and the view of the House itself that the compensation provided 10 years ago would be sufficient at the present time for the supervisors, which is $1,500 and a dollar for each thousand people and major fraction thereof enumerated in a district.

Mr. KING. I will ask the Senator why we can not specify the amount to be allowed instead of leaving it in rather an indefinite way?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is uncertain as to how many people are in the various districts, and for that reason it was thought that a given sum plus a dollar for each thousand names and major fraction thereof would be a better form of compensation and would be something of an inducement to greater activity in the performance of duty.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator state that the evidence before the committee and the experience of the department have proved that $1,500 is not sufficient compensation?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That seems to be the consensus of opinion among those who have had experience in the matter.

Mr. KING. I believe, Mr. President, that the $1,500 compensation provided is adequate, but I withdraw the amendment if the fact is that in the past they have been allowed the same compensation provided by this bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Utah is withdrawn.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of section 15, on page 17.

DEMOBILIZATION OF AMERICAN TROOPS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in regard to the question of demobilization. It will be remembered that shortly after the armistice the War Department, through Gen. March and others, as I recall, made statements to the press of the country that the Army would be demobilized at the rate of about 30,000 men a day. The latest figures shown by the department on Saturday are that 693,889 had been demobilized up to that date, or an average of about 11,564 men per day since the armistice, just a few more than one-third of the estimate of the department. Of course, the department must have planned to demobilize 30,000 per day or the first statement would not have been made. Of course, the department must have thought it advisable to demobilize 30,000 per day or that number would not have been fixed upon. We can not assume that the department was guessing at the number it planned to demobilize per day. It is no answer now to say we are demobilizing faster than England is. England's situation is different from ours. England's needs are different from ours. Surely our own original plans have not been changed because England is demobilizing more slowly than we are.

Mr. President, soldiers are being kept in camps, having absolutely nothing to do; officers are being kept in camps also with no duties to perform. I am speaking solely of our domestic forces. The Army abroad is under the control of Gen. Pershing, and, of course, he should be absolutely in control of that situation, but when he sends troops back here they should be immediately demobilized. If he had a use for them they would not be sent back.

The war is over, and it is our duty to get back to a peace basis at the earliest practicable moment. Our boys went into the Army, most of them, giving up excellent positions in civil life, in order to defend their country in the time of their country's peril. Now that that peril is over, surely it is as little as their country can do to permit them to go back to their accustomed duties. This was what was promised them. In many instances it seems to be the policy of the authorities not to permit the boys to be discharged upon application, if such discharge can be avoided. This is unjustifiable.

I wish especially to call the attention of the Senate to Circular No. 77 of the War Department, which I ask to have inserted in my remarks at this point without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Circular No. 77.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 21, 1918.

DISCHARGE OF ENLISTED MEN FOR RELIEF OF FAMILY OR URGENT NEED IN INDUSTRIAL WORK.

1. Department commanders within the United States, commanders of ports of embarkation, and commanders of camps not under the jurisdiction of department commanders or of chiefs of bureaus of the War Department, are authorized to discharge enlisted men upon their own application when there is sickness or other distress in the soldier's family, or when he is needed to resume employment in an industry or occupation in which there is urgent need of his services, provided that such discharge will not disrupt or cripple an existing organization, and that the soldier's services can be spared. Consideration will be given to the fact that the machinery of camps must be utilized in the demobilization of the Army and due regard must be taken that it is not retarded by the discharge of personnel connected therewith.

2. The instructions contained herein apply only to individual and exceptional cases and are not intended to release men in large groups or blocks for any general employment or occupation.

3. Application for discharge under the provisions of this circular will be made in each individual case by the soldier concerned and through his immediate commanding officer. No man who voluntarily enlisted prior to April 1, 1917, will be discharged under this authority.

4. Men discharged under these instructions will be included in such weekly reports of men discharged as are required by the War Department.

5. Cases of the character indicated arising in places not covered by this authority will be forwarded to The Adjutant General of the Army for final action.

(220.81, A. G. O.)

By order of the Secretary of War:

PEYTON C. MARCH,
General, Chief of Staff.

Official:
P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

Mr. McKELLAR. While this circular in its general terms is broad enough, men are not being discharged under it as rapidly and as freely as they should be discharged. Apparently it is the purpose of the commanding officers not to discharge at all, except when it can not be avoided. I think also a very restricted meaning has been given to it by the department. I have in mind especially the case of development companies, which, under a circular of the War Department, were to be demobilized among the first, as I recall. Up until a few days ago, and I imagine they are still there, there were four battalions of the development companies, two white and two colored, that were being held at Camp Meade for the purpose, so I am told, of keeping the development companies together until a plan could be devised by the War Department for handling permanent development companies.

Of course the Senate understands what development companies are. They are men underweight, frail and weak men, men afflicted with disease or unfit for military service. They are not soldiers and can not be made soldiers until they are rehabilitated and cured.

The idea of keeping these undeveloped and diseased men in the Army, now that the war is over, is little short of ridiculous. The idea of having permanent development companies in a peace army is farcical. It puts the Army authorities in an indefensible position to keep these men in the Army.

I have written the department about this matter, but no action has been taken up to this time.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate and the country to another great mistake that is being made by the Army authorities in not permitting the discharge of men who have their old or who may have new places in civil life open to them. Circular No. 77 ought to be amended so as to provide that any soldier, enlisted man or officer, who has a place open to him and who presents an application for a discharge and an affidavit from a would-be employer showing that the old place or a new one is open to him in agriculture, industry, commerce, or business, or in any other capacity, ought to be discharged at once, without regard to any supposed need of the Army for him. The need of the soldier for a permanent place is greater than the need of the Army for a particular soldier, now that the war is over.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator for me to make a suggestion at this point in his very able speech?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am glad the Senator is calling attention to what seems to me a very serious oversight on the part of the War Department. From my State recently I have had probably a hundred letters from fathers whose sons are in the Army, mothers, and wives who live in the country; and they are impressing upon me the necessity of having the boys at home in the very near future if they are to make crops during the present year. It seems to me the War Department would see the necessity especially for letting the farmer boys out of the Army now, if they are to make a crop, and be relieved from a year of idleness. I am glad the Senator from Tennessee is calling attention to what seems to me a very serious dereliction on the part of the War Department.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it is true that farmer boys all over the country ought to be returned to the farms without delay, where they have farms open to them. There are great numbers of men in the Army who have no such positions open to them and who can do such necessary work as may be required for the Army. It is safe to say that not less than 100 letters are received by me each day from citizens of Tennessee, urging that Tennessee soldiers who have positions open to them be discharged and permitted to take these places while they can get them. I imagine other Senators get as many or more.

At least one department of the Government—the Department of the Interior—is making most strenuous and splendid efforts to secure positions and employment for our returning soldiers. This department is entitled to the greatest commendation for its effort along this line; but while it is making these efforts, apparently the War Department, doubtless for the most part unintentionally, but nevertheless it is in effect dealing with the subject so as to prevent young men from getting places which are now open to them. The Interior Department is trying to get them employment. The War Department is in many cases refusing to let them off to accept employment.

Our departments should get together and work in harmony for the benefit of these soldiers, getting them employment wherever possible.

Mr. President, according to the present outlook, it will take 12 months to demobilize our Army. Plans for a more rapid demobilization ought to be made at once. The present plans are inadequate. Indeed, these men are not being demobilized much faster than they were brought into the Army by Gen. Crowder, and they were drafted, it will be remembered, only at intervals. A comparison of the two systems, one of the draft under Gen. Crowder and the one of demobilization under the War Department, shows a very marked difference in success of the draft plan as compared with the plan for demobilization adopted by the department. The department had better place the demobilization of the Army in the hands of Gen. Crowder. He gets results, and if he planned to demobilize that number it would be done.

Mr. President, the people of the United States are tired of this red tape in demobilization, and I want urgently to request the War Department to dispense with it. The sooner we get back on a normal peace basis the better it will be for the country, and the better, I may say, for the Army. It can hardly be believed that any officer in the War Department or in the Army is trying to hold back demobilization in order to effect a larger peace organization of the Army. If there are any such officers, and I hope there are none such, they are making a great mistake. Nothing will work more to prevent a large peace-time organization than this red tape and delay as to demobilization.

I have introduced a bill providing for a more expeditious demobilization of our domestic troops, but I hope the War Department may speed up without requiring further legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I have heard from several sources that there has been an order issued to the commanding officers at most of the cantonments in the United States that only a certain percentage of the men should be discharged. As the Senator is a member of the Military Affairs Committee, I wish to ask him whether he has any information on that point?

Mr. McKELLAR. No, Mr. President, I have not. I think the Navy has some such proposition, and I think that is whence the Senator received his information, or that it relates to the Navy Department.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure the Navy has——

Mr. McKELLAR. The Navy has, I know.

Mr. SMOOT. Because I have received letters from the officials of the Navy Department virtually stating that and giving the reasons why; but I have understood from letters that I have received—and, I will say to the Senator, from the soldiers themselves—when I have asked that they be discharged if not inconsistent with the successful working of the Army, stating that the soldier could not be discharged because of the fact that the percentage that had been agreed upon by the War Department for discharges had been reached, and he would have to wait his turn. I wondered whether or not any such order as that had been issued by the War Department.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not think there is such an order from the department. It may be the order of some camp commander. I will call the Senator's attention to circular 77, bearing on this subject, and, as it is a very live question, for the benefit of the Senate I will read just a part of it:

> Department commanders within the United States, commanders of ports of embarkation, and commanders of camps not under the jurisdiction of department commanders or of chiefs of bureaus of the War Department are authorized to discharge enlisted men upon their own application when there is sickness or other distress in the soldier's family, or when he is needed to resume employment in an industry or occupation in which there is urgent need of his services, provided that such discharge will not disrupt or cripple an existing organization and that the soldier's services can be spared.

If the War Department would leave out that proviso and instruct camp commanders to follow the order this matter would be absolutely settled; but I will say to the Senator, under this order the department commanders pay a great deal more attention, according to the letters I have received from them, to the proviso than they do to the main body of the circular. They seem to think that the discharge of a single man "disrupts or cripples an existing organization." In other words, whenever they see fit they decline to discharge soldiers, apparently without regard to the order, and the result is that only a very few men are being discharged on their own application, judging from the number of letters I receive on the subject. If that order was given its proper interpretation there probably would not be much trouble. Gen. Jervey, acting for the Chief of Staff, has in a letter to me put a very restricted meaning on the phrase "needed to resume employment in an industry or occupation in which there is urgent need of his services," and I assume that this restricted and distorted meaning of the phrase has been sent out to all commanding officers of camps. At all events, very few cases that have come under my notice have been discharged for this reason. I do not see how any fair-minded officer, under existing conditions, could refuse to discharge a man under him when a place is open to the soldier.

Now, it is clear that all of us are intensely anxious to get places for these boys in the Army. We are going to be called upon, and I think it will be perfectly right, to make appropriations that will cause the employment of a large number of these returning soldiers; public improvements may have to be made just to give them employment; and, while that is true, and while we all want to get them employment, here are thousands of young men with places open to them, but who can not take them because the War Department will not release them. I receive every day affidavits from would-be employers showing that men in the Army are absolutely necessary to their business. I had one the other day as to the manager of a concern that has been paid $20,000 a year salary The concern have no manager, and they are anxious to get their former employee back.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will excuse me just a minute, they were anxious to get this former employee back to take charge of the business. The War Department had refused time and time again to grant that young man a discharge, and it was only after the most strenuous exertion upon my part that I finally got him discharged a day or two ago, and I am very grateful to the department for granting that discharge.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me yield to the Senator from Colorado, who addressed the Chair first, and then I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to call the attention of the Senator first to the very circumstances that he has set forth, to show that demobilization can not take place as rapidly as he might desire.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just let me reply to the Senator in this way, and then I will let him go ahead and make the statement: If 30,000 per day can not be demobilized, why was it that our military authorities told us in the beginning that they were making arrangements to demobilize at the rate of 30,000 a day? Why now are they performing that promise by demobilizing at the rate of only 11,500 a day? In other words, if it is now right to demobilize 11,500 per day, why did the department fix upon 30,000 per day and lead the country to believe that they were going to demobilize 30,000 per day?

Mr. SHAFROTH. We had a discussion here the other day by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], and he was protesting most vigorously about the demobilization of men in large number without picking them out. He wanted those who had dependents upon them to be selected first, and the others to be held subject to the orders of the War Department. He made various other objections to the demobilization of men quickly. Now, Mr. President, I have not any doubt but that the policy of the Government is to demobilize these men within a reasonable time.

Mr. McKELLAR. According to the department apparently a reasonable time is 12 months. The law provides for 4 months after the peace signing in which the entire Army is to be demobilized, and the department, according to its own figures now, will occupy 12 months in demobilization. If they do not demobilize faster, or get the law changed, it may be that a part of the Army will be demobilized by lapse of time and by operation of law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But, Mr. President, it becomes necessary, for the very reasons that the Senator proposes, to find out who have dependents, who are needed for the farms, and so on. I supposed that demobilization usually took place in companies, but under the system which is proposed, and which seems to meet the approval of the Senator, as a matter of fact these discharges are made by individuals, depending upon the individual circumstances, and, of course, inquiry with relation to the matter, and perhaps the presentation of affidavits, must of necessity take considerable time. There should be examinations as to the physical condition of the soldier, because this war is going to bring forth enormous numbers of pension applications, and it will be important to know whether the man when he was discharged had a certain ailment or disease and as to whether he had it at the time of his enlistment. All of these matters make it almost impossible to discharge men in the manner that probably we would like to have them discharged, and I have no doubt, too, that there are many soldiers who do not care to be discharged quickly.

Mr. McKELLAR. My remarks have nothing to do with those men about whom the Senator is talking. I refer only to those who have places open to them, with an affidavit from the would-be employer that there are places open to them as the ground for asking the War Department to discharge them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have no doubt but that they will be discharged as soon as it can be gotten around to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Evidently they are not being discharged as the War Department expected to do it. There is a great difference between 11,500 and 30,000 per day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, that may be. The department no doubt finds difficulties in the way, as we all do when we undertake something that is new to us; and on that account it seems to me that we are making a very creditable showing when we have demobilized six hundred and some odd thousand soldiers since the armistice took place.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that the other day Gen. March gave out an interview to the effect that we were demobilizing our troops twice as rapidly as the British Empire had.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator probably was not in the Chamber when I addressed myself to that statement.

Mr. POMERENE. No; I was not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Gen. March gave out an interview in November, saying that the plan of the department was to demobilize at the rate of 30,000 a day; that they had not quite reached it then, but that was what they would do. They had demobilized up to last Saturday 693,889, which, by a simple calculation, is 11,564 per day, just a little over one-third of what they said they were going to demobilize per day. Now, by another simple calculation it will be found to take 12 months to demobilize our armies that were used in this war if we proceed in the future as we have in the past. The fact that England is not demobilizing more rapidly is a very different situation, because England is very differently situated. Besides, the department has already fixed 30,000 per day as the number of men that should and would be discharged. They published this determination. It was not conditioned upon the number that England might demobilize.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Chair.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Ohio first.

Mr. POMERENE. There are certainly two sides to this proposition. I want to see these soldiers demobilized and in their homes as quickly as we can get them there; but it is a question of employment now, and that must be considered; and I know the department has taken steps looking to the determination of what portion of these soldiers have employment in prospect and what portion have not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me now?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; surely.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator receive letters every day from young men or their parents saying that places are open to them and asking the Senator to get them discharged from the Army, and does not the Senator find that it is practically impossible to get them discharged from the Army? I find it most difficult to get young men discharged. There is no question of employment, I will say to the Senator, in the class of cases that I am talking principally about. I am talking about the cases where employment is open to the soldier and the employer is trying to get the soldier released for the purpose of giving him employment, and the Army officials will not discharge him for that worthy purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. We do get some of them; but I have a case which came to my knowledge to-day from my own State, referring to a young physician at one of the camps here. He is a specialist on nervous diseases. There is need for him at home, but the Army authorities say: "We need him here. These boys are coming back, and many of them need specialists of his type, and we must look after the returning boys first." Now, that is one illustration. I can understand why, though this young man is needed at home, the Army could not see their way clear to release him.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Tennessee that the governor of the State of Colorado wrote me a letter recently in which he very seriously objected to the discharge of soldiers in other places than the places where they enlisted. His theory was that they were discharged and given pay to get back to their point of enlistment, and that sometimes instead of doing so they expended their money and were unable to get back, and consequently he protested against the discharge of men other than at the place of enlistment. In other words, he wanted them brought back in a body to the cantonment and there mustered out of the service in the way which he thought would be the best way. Now, all of those are retarding things; and we who do not see the difficulties may think that they are taking a long time, but it seems to me that in view of the fact that nearly 700,000 men have been discharged in less than two months that is a mighty good record.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Colorado, if the Senator from Arkansas will excuse me just a minute, that there either has been or will be an application here from The Adjutant General's Department for increased clerk hire to answer letters about discharges. They are coming in in countless numbers, and most of them are about young men who have places open to them. I say that where a young man who is in the Army to-day has a place offered to him where he can go into civil life and make his own way, as he has done heretofore, it is the duty of the Government to discharge him instantly upon his examination.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think the Senator will find no difficulty in getting the discharge of that man.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, it is almost impossible to do it now. My mail is filled with refusals to discharge under these conditions.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator at present makes inquiry with relation to the matter, and that means delay; and the very fact that the department wants a large increase in the force for the purpose of determining this matter demonstrates, to my mind, that there is an inadequate force to make these decisions, and for that reason there must be delay occasioned by that inadequate force.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, it is high time we were furnishing a sufficient force to get these requests for discharges acted upon promptly. Let us get our boys back into their usual occupations at the earliest moment possible.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I do not see that very much good can result from this discussion, which seems to me inopportune, but which has been projected and thrust in here.

I am getting tired of hearing everything that the War Department does criticized all the time. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs stood here for two or three or four hours the other day and criticized the alleged mistakes and failures and miscarriages of plans of the War Department. Notwithstanding we had, after declaring war, mobilized an army and put it on the battle front in one-half of the time that it took England to mobilize and get her army only 30 miles across the Channel into France, he criticized the organization of our Army and the slowness of the department's procedure, and commended especially the wonderful system of demobilization of the Army of England, and said that we were unable to demobilize our Army at all; that we had no plan for it, and knew nothing about what would be done in the future; and now here is another member of the Military Affairs Committee, who is jumping on the administration in the same way.

I desire to have printed in the RECORD, without reading it, an article from the New York Times that shows how the British Army is being demobilized, and that Lloyd George must ask the patience of the army for the length of time required for its being disbanded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times of Jan. 9, 1919.]

LLOYD GEORGE ASKS PATIENCE OF ARMY—PREMIER SAYS POWERFUL FORCE MUST BE MAINTAINED TILL PEACE IS CONCLUDED—FLEET JOINS IN GRUMBLING—WAR OFFICE WARNS MEN CLAMORING FOR DEMOBILIZATION THEY ENDANGER COUNTRY.

LONDON, January 8.

Demobilization demonstrations were repeated to-day at the war office and some of the country camps. Gen. Robertson, commander of the forces, again received a deputation and promised the men the fullest investigation of their grievances.

An appeal was issued to-night on behalf of the premier saying Mr. Lloyd George was giving his personal attention to the matter and urging that as the German armies still were powerful it was necessary for Great Britain to maintain a strong army during the peace negotiations.

The men were urged to submit patiently to the inevitable inequalities and hardships. They were reminded that discipline was imperative and that the present course of the the soldiers would delay and not advance demobilization.

The Government has issued an announcement that from a date to be fixed no officer or soldier in France will be allowed to come to England on leave except on the distinct understanding that he will return to France at the expiration of his leave, and that on no pretext whatever will he be discharged during leave. The statement adds:

"Experience shows this order to be necessary in order to insure the maintenance of the army of occupation, the personnel of which must receive leave in their return."

The vicinity of the war office was invaded yesterday by lorries filled with men and by marching soldiers. They came from the Shoreham Camp. Many of them were on leave from Saloniki and objected to being sent back.

On the sides of the lorries were signs reading, "Get a move on," "We won the war; give us our tickets," "Get on with it, Lloyd George," and other similar sentiments. The men were generally well-behaved and treated the matter humorously, although they refused to disperse until a deputation was seen by officials, who assured them that Viscount Milner, secretary of state for war, and Gen. Sir William Robertson were then in conference on the grievances advanced by the soldiers.

A war office statement prints an address by Maj. Gen. Fielding, commander of the London district, to troops assembled in the war office quadrangle. He absolutely declined to consider grievances submitted in such a manner by the troops, and told them they must bring their objections to their own headquarters and to their own commanding officers. He reminded them that the war was still on and that "although we have won the war, we may lose the peace." He said he knew the trouble was being fomented by only a few agitators, and that "most of the men would be ashamed of the action they are taking if they only knew the danger in which they are placing the country."

One of the chief causes of dissatisfaction has been the belief held by numbers of the troops that they were to be sent to Russia. This has been dispelled by the official statement issued at the war office yesterday, saying that there was not the slighest intention of dispatching new forces to Russia.

It has been announced authoritatively that the rate of demobilization, which last week was 10,000 per day, has been already increased to between 20,000 and 25,000 daily.

Discontent has also made its appearance in the Grand Fleet, especially among the auxiliaries, whose duty it has been to sweep up mines.

The crews of many of the auxiliaries were recruited from the fishing fleets, and the men wish to share in the huge profits now being made by the fishermen. Two pounds extra weekly had been offered to them to continue at work, but they agitated for their discharge. The Admiralty has settled the matter by deciding that only volunteers shall be engaged in sweeping mines. About 65 per cent of those engaged in mine sweeping volunteered for that service.

The press is generally displaying full sympathy with the troops, but the more influential newspapers do not hesitate to tell them that they are acting inadvisedly in taking their present course, which is not open to their comrades overseas, who are equally entitled to demobilization.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator give us his views on the question of our military plans in Russia?

Mr. KIRBY. My views about the military plans of this country in Russia are already made known to the public. I do not know why the American Army is in Russia to-day, except that the military exigencies originally required that a small contingent be sent there. I do say that if it is necessary for the Army to remain in Russia it must be reinforced until it is strong enough to take care of itself against all comers; or, if that can not be done, it ought to be withdrawn at once.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am in entire agreement with my friend from Arkansas about that matter; but when my friend jumps on me for being critical it seems to me that he is in the same boat. He has been criticizing our Army affairs in Russia.

Mr. KIRBY. I have not criticized our military affairs. I have not criticized the Government for finding a necessity for sending the Army there. I have not criticized the Government for retaining the Army there; but, if it is necessary to be done, then it must be strengthened; that is all.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is what I am saying about these boys. If it is necessary to let them be demobilized, let us demobilize them.

Mr. KIRBY. We should not demobilize our Army until the war is over; and the bill for the organization of the Army provides that within four months after the war is over the demobilization shall occur.

Mr. McKELLAR. One minute. The Senator says—and I judge he speaks with authority—that the War Department is not intending to demobilize our Army. When the Chief of Staff comes forward in an interview and says that he is going to demobilize them at the rate of 30,000 a day, it looks as if there is some difference of opinion between the Senator himself and the Chief of Staff, at any rate. I think the Senator ought to get together with his department before he defends it.

Mr. KIRBY. I am only discussing the law. The law providing for the organization of the Army says when it shall be demobilized, and we have not yet declared that the war is ended by proclamation of the President. We are proceeding with demobilization as rapidly as it can be done. Suppose we took the view that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has expressed here to-day, that we must send an army across into Russia to protect a bandit horde of Czecho-Slovaks who became traitors to their own country and joined the Russian Army, and when the Russian Army quit fighting they continued, overran Russia, and harassed the Russians throughout the old Empire. According to that Senator we must organize an army and go to Russia to protect these people from the fate that must inevitably overtake them. If that is to be done, why demobilize the Army at all? He says that there are 2,000,000 mercenaries, trained fighting men, in the army that now recognizes the Russian authority; and the same people that are in authority in Russia now said to us when our little force went there: "This is Russia, and whenever an army comes into our borders here, without our invitation, we must necessarily regard it as an unfriendly force and declare war against its country to protect ourselves."

That was done. Now, that is the condition over there. We talk about demobilizing the Army here. Why, the Senator from Tennessee talks about demobilization of the Army just as though it could be done like dismissing a country school. He would say, "Well, school is out, children; you can all go home." He seems to have some sort of an idea like that in his mind. As has been suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], these men must be examined physically.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not taking that course at all. I am just saying that I would prefer that the department would do what it said it was going to do, namely, that it would demobilize at the rate of about 30,000 a day. It seems to me that is a reasonable amount. That can be done. There is no doubt in the world about our ability to demobilize our forces at the rate of 30,000 a day. The department thought so 40 or 50 days ago. There is no reason why it should not be done; and I am insisting that they carry out their promise to the people to demobilize along that line. The people accepted it, and they ought to have it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Was not that simply an estimate made by an officer there as to whether they could do it?

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely nobody ought to be in a better position to make an estimate than the Chief of Staff.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How many estimates have been made as to the time it would take to construct a public building, and how many times are we disappointed in many respects? As a matter of fact, can you not allow latitude to an officer of the War Department to change his mind after he has determined upon an estimate of that kind?

Mr. McKELLAR. A difference of 19,000 out of 30,000 is a pretty wide latitude, and if he falls a little short there ought not to be any complaint.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be; but——

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will pardon me a minute, he is paid $7,500 a year, as the rest of us, and if two-thirds of it should be dropped off he would be left in a rather undesirable position about his salary.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. So it is with the War Department when it comes out and makes a statement to the country that the troops are going to be demobilized and sent back home and the boys with positions are going to be allowed to be discharged upon their individual application. I think they ought to comply with what they say. That is all I am saying, all I believe in, and all I request.

Mr. KIRBY. The Senator's position is a little singular in one respect of inconsistency, it seems to me. He has read a general order of the War Department, showing what the purpose is and how it ought to be applied. He has made no complaint that in the Navy Department only 20 per cent are expected to be released at all, and I understand the Marine Corps, consisting of over 200,000 men, nearly all of whom saw no fighting whatever in the war, is still intact.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to correct the Senator. In the first place, I am not as familiar with the Navy and Marine Corps as I am with military affairs, and I am talking about military affairs because I am familiar with them and keep up with them. In the next place, the Marine Corps is discharging men as rapidly as possible. I have never seen such activity as is displayed in that matter. They are acting very diligently about it from the commandant, Gen. Barnett, on down, as far as I know. The Navy Department I am not familiar with, but they are discharging men quite rapidly in that department; but that is different from the Army, because there are very few men comparatively in the Navy.

Mr. KIRBY. They provide for the discharge of only 20 per cent, and when it gets down to results they are allowing certain commanders and commandants to exercise the exclusive power to discharge these men, and if they do not think the men can be discharged without injury to the service they are not discharged at all. Their decisions are not reviewed like is done in the War Department, where discharges are granted in great numbers, notwithstanding the action of the commandants in refusing them in the first instance. But let us pass by that for a moment. Has it ever occurred to the Senate what might happen if the war is not over? Some of you have stood here and talked about universal military training and what shall be done hereafter to keep an Army and how many men we shall have in our standing Army, as though the war is over. But if this war is not ended, if all the government that Germany has is destroyed and Germany gets into the condition of the Russian people, so that we must go there and occupy that country with an army and reestablish the government under a protectorate, in order that it may be compelled to perform its obligations because of the crimes it has committed against humanity, how many men in an army from this country will it take to do it? Will a new army need to be raised for that purpose? How many will it take if we must go into Russia and pacify that country, which is torn and dismantled and dismembered and destroyed from the mighty empire it once was?

Mr. McKELLAR. Do I understand that the Senator argues in favor of sending a great army into Russia?

Mr. KIRBY. I am not in favor of that; but if you must do it, how many men do you want to discharge now?

Mr. McKELLAR. I may be mistaken, but I thought the Senator was opposed to the War Department sending any troops into Russia. Am I mistaken?

Mr. KIRBY. You are not mistaken.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is what I thought.

Mr. KIRBY. But it all hinges on negotiations that are pending now yonder in the Old World about the settlement of this controversy. We have found it necessary to retain 30 divisions of the Army in France and Germany, and suppose it is necessary to resume fighting.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I interrupt the Senator again? Does the Senator want the Senate and the country to understand that he is opposed to the demobilization of our troops in this country?

Mr. KIRBY. No; the Senator does not want the country to understand that, nor does he want the Senate to understand it, and he does not want to be interrupted any more by the Senator. I let him finish his speech, and I would be glad to hear him make another speech when I get through. I do not care about having him take my time here on that proposition. Before we get too far from the subject of demobilization I want to say that I think every man ought to be permitted to go home at the earliest possible moment, consistent with the good of the service and the safety of the country. I think that ought to be done. I think we ought to have a policy outlined as soon as it can be done definitely about what is to be done with reference to future armament; and until that is done, what are you going to do? Here is one man who insists that we ought to have universal military training. Another Senator says all the Army ought to be discharged at once, and he talks about it like it might be done in 15 or 20 minutes.

It seems to me if there was a policy and if we do need a great army we might have dispensed with any necessity for universal military training in the next few years by putting all the men who are to be discharged upon the inactive reserve list subject only to call into active service again on the proclamation of the President within three years, upon a declaration of war being made. We would then have had an army that could be raised on the proclamation of the President upon a declaration of war and the necessity of it, an army already thoroughly trained, and that necessarily would be composed of able fighting men. That would have dispensed with all the idea of this other way of doing things that has been suggested and would not have required any soldier on the reserve list to report for active service again unless a declaration of war was made and an army needed in the next three years. It is suggested that we dismember and demobilize our domestic army, and that our foreign army be allowed to remain yonder where necessity requires it until the necessity is ended, however long that may be.

I believe the War Department is going along with this work as rapidly as it can be done under existing circumstances. I know the War Department performed wonderful achievements in the organization of this Army. I know the Army has covered itself with glory in fighting on the fields of France. Now, we are back here at home. We have won a great victory, and I believe we ought to be a little patient and let these men be demobilized as rapidly as they can be, without too much criticism of the War Department down here that put the whole thing into being in the first place and established, transported, and maintained the Army and expect to continue to demobilize it as rapidly as it can be done.

That is all I want to say about it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

EDITH CAROW ROOSEVELT.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Pensions I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 5318) granting a pension to Edith Carow Roosevelt, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of that measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Edith Carow Roosevelt, widow of Theodore Roosevelt, late President of the United States, and pay her a pension at the rate of $5,000 per year from and after the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

RECESS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 15, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 14, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, the Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Unto Thee, O God, our heavenly Father, in whose sacred presence we dwell, do we lift up our hearts in gratitude for that providence which hitherto has shaped and guided the destiny of our Republic.

Keep us, we beseech Thee, evermore in touch with Thee, that we may more and more increase in everything that makes a nation great and glorious; that we may further demonstrate to the world the utility of our sacred principles, justice, liberty, equal rights for all, and thus hallow Thy name as faithful disciples of the Jesus of Nazareth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Vice President, in pursuance of Senate concurrent resolution No. 28, had appointed as members of the joint committee on exercises in commemoration of the life, character, and public service of the late Theodore Roosevelt Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That Mr. FLETCHER be appointed a conferee on the part of the Senate on the bill (S. 1419) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce," in the place of Mr. SHIELDS, excused.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

An act (S. 3469) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," approved August 10, 1917; to the Committee on Agriculture.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR SUNDAY, JANUARY 19, 1919.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assigns the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to preside next Sunday.

LIGNITE COAL AND PEAT.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3220, known as the lignite bill, insist on the House amendments thereto, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3220, to insist on the House amendments thereto, and agree to the conference. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3220) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations through the Bureau of Mines of lignite coal and peat, to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. FOSTER, Mr. WINGO, and Mr. DENISON.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee be discharged from further consideration of the bill H. R. 14077, a bill introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL], and relating to motion-picture shows, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Education. I understand the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary stated to Mr. RANDALL that he thought this bill should go to the Committee on Education, and I will state for the information of the House that last year the committee had considerable hearings and those hearings have been printed, and perhaps some expense in the form of printing hearings this year might be saved if this bill were referred to the Committee on Education.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I do not see how the Committee on Education has jurisdiction of a bill of the character the gentleman has mentioned.

The SPEAKER. The bill was sent to the Judiciary Committee because it contained a penalty.

Mr. SEARS. I simply made the request because session before last it was referred to the Committee on Education, and at the last session it was also referred to the Committee on Education. It is immaterial to me.

Mr. GARD. I reserve the right to object for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question. Does the bill carry a penalty for some noncompliance with the law relating to moving-picture shows, or what is it?

Mr. SEARS. I find in section 12 that "a violation of any of the provisions of this act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000." I had not read the bill.

Mr. GARD. Then it is clearly not a bill for the Committee on Education, Mr. Speaker, and I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter written to me by Mr. Simon W. Rosendale on the subject of "Zionism."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter on the subject of "Zionism." Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman reserve his objection? The "official censor" of the House has passed on this, and I thought you would not press that in his absence.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was asked by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], to safeguard the RECORD in his absence.

Mr. SANFORD. Perhaps you will take my word for it that he has passed on it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, I am exercising in his absence my own particular judgment, and therefore I object.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent to dispense with the business in order on to-morrow, Calendar Wednesday, for the purpose——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to dispense with business in order for Calendar Wednesday—to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what are we going to do to-day and to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. We will have under consideration the legislative bill. We are going to try to get through by Thursday night, if possible.

Mr. MANN. You can not do that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am asking to dispense with it for the purpose of trying to do the best we can to conclude it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LITTLE. Just one minute. Mr. Speaker, I ask for indefinite leave of absence for Congressman LUNDEEN, of Minnesota, on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for Congressman LUNDEEN on account of sickness. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 14078, the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] if we can not agree upon time for general debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think, if the gentleman is in an agreeable frame of mind, there will be no difficulty whatever in agreeing upon time. I have requests on this side for more than four hours, not considering a request from my colleague on the committee [Mr. GOOD] or considering any time for myself. That is the condition of affairs that confronts me in the determination of what can be agreed upon as to time in the discussion of this bill in general debate.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sure the gentleman is as anxious as I am or any other Member of the House to dispose of this bill at the earliest possible moment. The gentleman is aware that another appropriation bill is to follow this, and then another. I was wondering if some of these gentlemen who have asked the gentleman for time would not be willing to take their time on a succeeding appropriation bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say to the gentleman that I am quite as desirous as the gentleman is toward having this bill completed at an early date. It is a very long bill. I believe when we come to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule we shall make rapid progress, but these requests have been pending for a long time. They are largely upon subjects connected with current legislation, and those gentlemen are very insistent that they be granted the privilege at the present time. I would suggest that we go ahead to-day without any limitation and run maybe until 6 o'clock or 6.30, and then see what the status is and limit debate either when we get back into the House to-night or when we meet to-morrow morning.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Could we not agree that debate close to-night? We could sit until 9 o'clock if necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that is impracticable in view of the fact that these Members who have requested time desire an audience. I think if we run to 6.30 we would make good headway and be able to close debate some time to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to suggest that in making that arrangement I would like to have him consider me for an hour?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that, including the request just made by the gentleman from Texas, I have requests for about three hours, and I shall want a little time for myself to explain some of the provisions of the bill. Could the gentleman get along on eight hours, to be equally divided?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not see how we possibly could, unless the gentleman wishes to keep out the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] and myself from making remarks.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course I do not want to do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. In that case I shall be willing to sacrifice my own time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the time for general debate be equally divided, and that one-half be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and one-half by myself. Perhaps we can agree later on as to limitation of time.

The SPEAKER. Do you fix any limit?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not at present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, pending his motion, asks unanimous consent that the time be controlled half and half by himself and the gentleman from Wisconsin. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO THE NAVAL ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces as members of the Board of Visitors at Annapolis: Mr. PADGETT, Mr. ESTOPINAL, Mr. RIORDAN, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. BROWNING. The statute is so obscure that I do not know whether the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is an ex officio member or not, but the Chair will consider it.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 14078, the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 14078, the legislative appropriation bill, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 14078, the legislative appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14078) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if it is agreeable to the gentleman from Tennessee, I would like to yield some time at the present moment. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have received so many letters on different subjects relating to the failure in the main of the War Risk Insurance Bureau or the War Department to attend properly to the Government's business that I think that I ought to call the attention of the House in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to a few of them. My information is, from talks with other Members of the House, that they are in receipt of similar letters, although I hope not to the extent that I have been during the last few days or weeks.

I have not asked for very much time; I will proceed with these letters. I read:

CHICAGO, January 6, 1919.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am inclosing a copy of letter written by Mrs. Ethel Halpin to The Adjutant General of the United States with reference to her wounded husband, Thomas E. Halpin.

She and her mother-in-law have been left in absolute ignorance as to the condition of this man, who was severely wounded by machine-gun bullets in September, 1918. Mrs. Halpin is amazed to receive from the War Department a letter by which she is referred to the Bureau of Communications, American Red Cross, Washington, D. C., for information as to the condition of her husband, a soldier of the United States, wounded in its service. The absurdity of referring relatives to some voluntary organization for information regarding the condition of a man wounded in the service of his country, in the hospital, or perhaps dead, is such that it calls for the most vigorous action on behalf of the relatives here.

I respectfully request you, on behalf of Mrs. Halpin, that you make an effort to obtain some information as to this man's whereabouts and condition. I confidently intrust this matter to you with the expectation that some information may be obtained through the War Department.

Yours, very truly,

GEO. R. SANDERSON.

P. S.—I am inclosing you a photostatic copy of Gen. Parker's letter.

CHICAGO, ILL., January 6, 1919.

Hon. AUSTIN A. PARKER,
Adjutant General United States,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of the 3d instant with reference to my husband, Thomas E. Halpin, Company D, One hundred and eighth Engineers, who was severely wounded by machine-gun bullets September 26, 1918. Neither his mother, Mrs. Mary C. Halpin, 3641 Lexington Street, Chicago, Ill., nor myself has received any information from him, from the War Department, or from any source, respecting this wounded man since the first information to my mother-in-law.

Surely the United States takes more interest in its wounded soldiers than to ignore the repeated requests of interested relatives as to their whereabouts and present condition. Instead of having to refer to the American Red Cross, I repeat my inquiry to the War Department. I want to know where my husband is and how he is. I think I am entitled to this information from official sources, without being asked to call upon some voluntary organization for information.

I invoke the prompt action of the War Department, and I shall certainly expect to get definite and immediate answer from you.

Yours, very truly,

———.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 3, 1919.

Mrs. ETHEL HALPIN,
Care Continental Casualty Co.,
919 Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

MADAM: I regret to advise you that this office has received no further information concerning Pvt. Thomas E. Halpin, Company D, One hundred and eighth Engineers, who was wounded severely by machine-gun bullet September 26, 1918.

Notification to this effect was sent by telegraph to his mother, Mrs. Mary C. Halpin, 3641 Lexington Street, Chicago, Ill., the emergency address left by the soldier.

For further information concerning his condition you should write to Bureau of Communications, American Red Cross, Washington, D. C.

Respectfully,

AUSTIN A. PARKER,
Adjutant General.

These parties had written to The Adjutant General's Office for information, and they received this reply under date of January 3, 1919:

I regret to advise that this office has received no further information concerning Pvt. Thomas E. Halpin, Company D, One hundred and eighth Engineers, who was wounded severely by machine-gun bullet September 26, 1918—

And so forth; and this:

For further information concerning his condition you should write to Bureau of Communications, American Red Cross, Washington, D. C.

Here is a man wounded severely in the service of the United States on the firing line in September last. His wife has been informed of the injury and, as I shall show later, with other letters, is probably unable to get into communication directly with the soldier through correspondence and writes to The Adjutant General's Office to inquire about the soldier. Now, it would be just as cheap for The Adjutant General's Office to cable to France or to write to France as it is for the Red Cross to do it. I can conceive no meaner disposition on the part of the Government than to tell a wondering and grieving wife, "Your husband was severely wounded nearly four months ago, and if you want to know how he is communicate with a private party."

I can understand how the Government in certain cases may not be able to give information, but when they can acquire it as easily as somebody else there is absolutely no excuse for the Government refusing to perform its duty in order to turn it over to the Red Cross. [Applause.]

I said probably the department had not been able to get into correspondence with the soldier, because letters written to soldiers in hospitals in France are meanwhile being returned to the writers through the Dead Letter Office, and no effort apparently is being made by the Army to deliver the letters addressed to soldiers in hospitals in France. Here is a letter dated January 6:

Inclosed find returned letter to me not delivered to my son who has been in France for 14 months.

This is from a father. He has a letter from his son dated December 17, saying:

No mail from you for five weeks and no pay for six months.

Notwithstanding the letter of Gen. Lord published in the newspapers and the letter of Secretary Baker, stating that these men were being paid up to date, no mail for five weeks and no pay for six months; and this is a mild case. This letter is from Theodor Rasch. Here is the envelope addressed to Harry H. Rasch, Headquarters, One hundred and forty-ninth United States Field Artillery, Base Hospital No. 17, American Post Office 715, American Expeditionary Forces, France, postmarked at South Chicago, September 14, 11.30 p. m., 1918. Stamped "Returned to writer." The letter in full is as follows:

SOUTH CHICAGO, ILL., January 6, 1919.

Congressman JAMES R. MANN.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed find returned letter to me not delivered to my son, who has been in France for 14 months. He was gassed August 7 at Fismes and sent to hospital at Dijon Base Hospital No. 17; from there he went to different camps and latter part of September he received two letters from home. October 10 he wrote from Base Hospital No. 6; next letter written October 23, when he was at front north of Verdun. He received letters at front November 10, and now he is or has been at Base Hospital No. 49; letter written by him to home dated December 17, in which he said no mail from you for five weeks and no pay for six months. Kindly give this your attention.

Yours, respectfully,

THEODOR RASCH.

Here is a letter from a gentleman, who is a man of very high standing in the city of Chicago:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
CUSTODIAN SERVICE,
South Chicago, Ill., January 4, 1919.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN, M. C.

DEAR MR. MANN: I again trouble you, and this time with a genuine grievance not only of my own but of several other parents here, who have the same tale to tell that I have.

I inclose three envelopes just received back from France. These are only a few of several, similarly treated, received by other parents here; however, I will only deal with the case of my own son.

This boy enlisted at the age of 19. He was not 21 till the 8th of December last. You will note from the address that he is a member of Col. Foreman's regiment. He is first gunner of his battery, and, I am informed, has the reputation of being the best gunner of the regiment. He was all through the fighting with his regiment up until about the middle of October when he was sent back to a base hospital. During this time he was one whole month without ever taking off his clothes, slept in trenches, where he would wake up with water about him and rats running over him; slept on the bare ground, lived on bully beef and hard tack, and most of this time handled his gun with his hands in bandages and regretted exceedingly to have to leave the fighting zone when he did. And now the sequel: This boy that offered his life for his flag and country is wounded or incapacitated and sent to a base hospital, and through the orders or regulations of some military martinet or stupid postal official he has not received a particle of mail since going to the hospital, and his case is only one of hundreds of other boys wounded or sick in the hospitals. In God's name, what good military or other purpose is served by such regulations? Surely if there is any time in his life when a boy would be anxious to hear from his family and friends it is when lying sick amongst strangers. The man who is responsible for this regulation, whether military or postal and whether high or low, is a stupid brute, and instead of occupying a responsible position should be punching red steers on the plains.

The family and friends have been writing him regularly. The night I heard he was sent to the hospital I wrote him and inclosed a money order for $50, thinking he might need funds. I sent him money again, as a Christmas present, and his sisters have sent him money as well as other little inclosures that they thought he would like. One of my brothers, a priest in Ireland, on learning that he was in hospital and expecting that he would get a furlough when he recovered, wrote him and offered to pay all his expenses if he would visit the old home and relatives. And not one of those letters has he received. He writes home regularly, and in all his letters is begging for some word from home. Here is a quotation from a letter received yesterday from him:

"It seems years since there was any mail from home for me. This isolation from the place that occupies my mind at all times now makes me feel like an outcast, but I am expecting mail any day now. It is bound to get here some time, unless I leave too soon. A bunch of letters would be the most welcome Christmas present that I could ask for."

Imagine what thoughts must pass through this poor chap's mind. He does not know whether we at home are now among the living or the dead. Such a mental state is certainly not conducive to his quick recovery. And the brute who is responsible for those regulations did not have human feeling or wit enough, if there was any excuse for such regulations, to let the poor wounded or sick boys know that they would not have any mail sent them to the hospitals and thus in a measure relieve them of some cause of worry. We hear so much on this side of the water of the wonderful things that are doing and to be done for the sick and wounded. If there are any other regulations like this one, may God help the poor fellows. And this is the reward for those boys who endured untold hardships and shed their blood for their country.

I can not believe that Secretary Baker or other responsible Army heads know of this treatment of the sick and wounded, as well as their families, for the relatives worry as much as the poor boys in not being able to communicate with them. One of my daughters yesterday, in desperation, sent a cablegram to the hospital where Clifford is. I don't suppose that he will even be allowed to receive this. I may add that the boy says that he is in good health, only that there is infection in his wounded hands, hence receiving mail could be of no possible injury to him.

Now, Mr. MANN, I would ask you as a great favor to take this matter up with officials of the War Department that a stop may be put to this regulation. It may not do my boy any good, as he may be back with his regiment or on his way home before anything is done, but it will be a great act of charity on your part toward the other poor fellows in the hospitals.

My son's address to where we send his mail is as given on the envelopes:

"Corpl. Clifford O'Sullivan, Battery C, One hundred and twenty-second United States Field Artillery, American Expeditionary Forces, France."

The hospital to which he was sent is: "Base Hospital 19, Vichy, Allier, France." He cautions us to send all mail to his regimental address.

Wishing you a happy and prosperous New Year, I remain,

Very sincerely, yours,

P. T. O'SULLIVAN.

And here are the letters that were sent, returned to the writers, addressed to Corpl. Clifford O'Sullivan, Battery C, One hundred and twenty-second Regiment, Field Artillery, American Expeditionary Forces, France. They are marked "Sick, 10/10. Return to writer. Dead Letter Division, P. E. S., C. P. O., A. E. F."

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. I have not the time.

Mr. DYER. I just wanted to know if the letters were returned from France, or if they ever left the United States?

Mr. MANN. They were returned from France, from the dead-letter office of the American Expeditionary Forces. They knew where he was. Somebody knew, and any sort of organization would have found him. Money was sent to him, letters from home were sent to a boy less than 21 years of age who had been fighting his machine gun with his hands bandaged. Then he was sent to the hospital and could not hear from home. And if his family should ask the War Department about him they would be told to go to the Red Cross, that they have something else to do besides give information about wounded soldiers. In the opinion of The Adjutant General a wounded soldier is a petty thing.

Here is another letter:

JANUARY 2, 1918.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I take this liberty in addressing you on a matter which not only concerns myself but also many other western men, who, after serving their country faithfully and suffering great hardships in the field overseas, return to this great country of ours and are held for an indefinite period in eastern training camps.

My case is this: Our regiment arrived from Brest, France, December 22. Upon our arrival at this camp all the men from the Eastern or New England States were discharged in the course of four days. We of the West are being held here for what reason no one seems to know, and in spite of our appeals for discharge, even offering to waive our transportation money, we can get no results.

There is not a man among us who is not frantic to get home to his loved ones, and it seems that we are entitled to some consideration as well as those who live in Boston.

Could I call upon you, Mr. MANN, to look into this matter and see if it is not possible to have us discharged and sent home from here without any more red tape of being sent to some other camp for another stretch of waiting

Yours, sincerely, Private JAMES J. HILL.

Battery "C," Seventy-third Artillery, Camp Devens, Mass.
Chicago address, 1639 North Tripp Avenue.

Here is another letter:

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN MANN: I am a member of the Medical Department, United States Army, and have been for nearly a year past located at the base hospital, Camp Grant, Ill. You will, therefore, understand my reason for withholding my name for the present, as a good many men whom I have known have been severely handled for writing to their Senators and Congressmen, and I do not care to run the risk of a court-martial at this late date.

No effort whatever is being made to demobilize the enlisted personnel, and it appears that we may be in service for another eight months or a year. The manner in which applications for discharge are handled is an absolute farce. Although an average of 20 applications for discharge are being accepted each day, only 5 have been approved to date. Letters addressed to the commanding general, Capt. Grant, through military channels are returned to the writer without individual comment by the commanding officer base hospital, in direct contradiction to instructions contained in Army Regulations regarding the transmittal of military letters. At least 90 per cent of the applications are cases of actual hardship in the applicant's family and are supported by the usual affidavits. They are not even given consideration and their rejection unquestionably means that untold suffering will result.

This letter is not being written because of my personal grievance, but because I feel that a man who has served his Nation faithfully and well should not be treated like a dog, but should receive justice.

Here is another letter:

CHICAGO, ILL., January 8, 1919.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN.

DEAR SIR: Will you kindly tell me why my husband has never received one of my letters since he arrived in France? He arrived at France around the 1st of October, and I have written every other day reguarly, and he keeps sending cablegrams, "Why don't you write?" He went over with the Thirty-first Division from Macon, Ga., and was transferred to the postal express service lately. Will you please see what you can do for me, as I need him home badly, as my father died in November, leaving me an added expense to my mother. Will you please help me to find out why he does not receive my letters, as he is terribly worried at not hearing from me.

Thanking you in advance for this kind favor, I am,

Very truly, yours,

Mrs. R. A. MACKIE,
7157 South Halsted Street, Chicago, Ill.
(Third Apartment, care of Mrs. Hull).

My husband's address is as follows: Corpl. Rae A. Mackie, No. 1360966, Postal Express Service, A. P. O. 717. American Expeditionary Forces, Tours, France.

And this man is in the postal express service of the Army; but through the absolute disorganization of the War Department a man in the postal express service, who has the money to cable home, can not hear from his wife. He might have been exempted from the service if he had asked exemption, but he did not.

Here is another letter:

CHICAGO, ILL., January 8, 1919.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find clippings from the Chicago Tribune of January 5 and 6 relating to treatment given our boys who are over in France. You will find it a good sample of many cases who have been treated the same way. I have a son over there since August 2, who has not received one letter since arriving there; we have written more than 50 letters and friends have written at least 25 more, and he has not received a solitary one. We receive letters from him about every three weeks, the last one about a week ago said he had not had a cent of pay for five months but would not care for the money if he could only hear from home to know we were still alive.

He was quite seriously wounded in the Argonne fight, and about the 5th of October was in base hospital 54, where he wrote to us from, saying he would give anything for a letter from home. About the 20th of October I wrote him at the base hospital. I wrote a letter at the same time to the United States Postal Express Service and his commanding officer to try and get some mail to him, but could not stir up anything. On December 6 I got telegram from adjutant's office saying, "Sorry to inform you Earl Eyer is missing in action since October 30." I answered back telling in which hospital he had written us from and to verify and answer back. I got no response in reasonable time, so I wrote him full particulars as to the boy being wounded and in hospital since October 5; that we had several letters from him and the date of last one at that time, which was November 3.

In a few days I received a telegram which read: "December 16. Cabled for information concerning Pvt. Earl Eyer; will advise report when received. Harris." On January 6, 1919, I received the following telegram, "Pvt. Earl Eyer, Infantry, previously reported missing in action since October 30, now reported returned to duty December 30. Harris."

I received a cablegram from the boy January 2 saying he was well; that gave me a telegraph address, and I cabled back next day to let him know we were all well. I will also inclose the envelopes of two letters returned on the 6th; you can judge for yourself whether they have ever been across the ocean or not; if they have been, why were they not delivered to him? If they knew he was wounded before I told them where he was, they surely could have delivered mail. It looks like the mail service overseas has been as rotten as the aeroplane and munition works corporations. You will please excuse my very plain expressions in this matter, but when we have deprived ourselves to help win this war and have our sons suffer the way so many do, and apparently on account of inefficiency of management of our worthy Cabinet, can you wonder that we feel the way we do?

Yours, truly,

W. EYER,
710 East Sixty-ninth Street, Chicago.

This envelope, addressed to Earl Eyer, Company I, Fourth Infantry, American Expeditionary Forces, via New York, has a pencil memorandum—

Wounded 11/13.

It is postmarked at Chicago September 23 last. It has also—

Returned to writer.

Here is another one addressed to the same man, and it is also marked—

Wounded; returned to writer.

Here is another letter from the boy himself. It is dated December 11 last, and is as follows:

DEAR MOTHER, DAD, AND BROTHERS: It has been three months since I have had any mail, and I am lonesome and downhearted. My mail is somewhere in France, and the Lord only knows when I will get it. I hope and trust you are all well and happy. Life for the past month has been hell. It seems as though all of the S. O. S. are against us. There are 490 of us in this camp. All of us have either been wounded or sick; and do you know what they have us doing? Stevedore work, unloading coal, etc. While we do such work the S. O. S. are playing ball and writing letters. If you hear of me going to jail, you will know that I put one of these S. O. S. birds to sleep. It gets a fellow's goat after he has spent nine months in the lines, dodged death a few times, sleeping in shell holes, rain and mud, and then have to come back here and do their work. We spend most of the time in pup tents, while they are sleeping in barracks, with stoves and bunks in them. After two weeks of the above we moved into a barracks and were told to make ourselves comfortable. Everyone got for himself a bunk, after carrying it about half a mile and putting it together. We spent one night in it and were told to move, and in came negroes to sleep in the bunks we carried and built. They moved us into barracks without windows and doors, and we again had to sleep on the ground. It rained last night, and the barracks were as waterproof as a sponge. We have not seen a pay day in months—

I call this especially to the attention of Secretary Baker—and they will not try to get our mail, so you see how miserable this makes things for us. The Eighty-sixth Division, as you know, is the Blackhawk, and it comes from Chicago. They have been over here for four months, and they think it is awful because they have not gone back by this time. We have been here since October 31, 1917, and, according to the papers, they are going to ask Congress to pass a law which will give them authority to keep us over here indefinitely. Oh, well, we had an easy time of it. We were only in the following battles: Champagne, Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, Verdun, and the Argonne Forest, and in each one saw many of our pals fall from the Hun fire; but regardless of all, I can go back and say I have done my bit to help win the war. I was in the first big American battle and the last one and did not quit until I was forced to. It has been three long, weary months since I heard from home, and I am lonesome and disgusted. I have been in this camp for a month and, to tell you the truth, it has been the most miserable month I have spent since I have been here, and I have had some miserable days. I feel as bad and pretty near worse than when I was sent to the hospital, having been taken off the field of battle. All they think of back here is to work us day and night. There are 400 from our division here. Everyone has seen action and has been sick or wounded. Instead of giving us good living quarters, they house us in barracks without windows or doors, and, to top things off, we have been sleeping on the ground. You will not find the S. O. S. men living like this. They have warm barracks and bunks and instead of working they write letters and play ball, and we have to do their work. I told you in one of my letters not to write to me any more. Well, mother, cancel that order. It looks as though we will be here for a long time, so keep on writing. I must close, as I am out of news, and disgusted. Hoping you are well and happy, I remain, with love,

Your son,

JACK.

Was he entitled to a letter from home? Do you not think the Government could afford to deliver his mail to him—a boy who was in almost every one of the big battles, who was wounded and sent to a hospital, who was compelled to sleep on the ground? Do you not think the Government might at least have given him his mail? It did not pay him; it did not provide him with decent quarters. He was sent to the hospital. Was not the least the Government could do to deliver his mail to him? What kind of an organization is it over there—hampered undoubtedly by regulations from here—which after a year and a half of war can not pretend to get the mail into the camps and hospitals?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman why those letters were returned. Was there any reason for it? Were they not delivered to the hospital—the one the gentleman mentioned previous to this.

Mr. MANN. There was no reason given except that the man was wounded and it was returned to the writer.

Mr. FLOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman how many letters were returned.

Mr. MANN. I have given the address here of quite a number, but I have a great many more in my office. I was just about to say that the Assistant Postmaster General is reported to have said the other day that there were three or four tons of these letters returned from France.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman that several days ago I got a letter from a parent of one of the boys who went over there, and he was wounded and in the hospital, saying that certain letters had been returned, and I wrote him and suggested that perhaps the boy was on his way home, and about a week after that he arrived at Norfolk. I thought perhaps that might be the case here.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; there can be no excuse made. The boys were there in the hospital and the letters were in the hands of the postal officials of the War Department over there, and instead of being delivered they were returned to the writer, although they had the indorsement on the envelope itself that the man was wounded, and they knew he was wounded, and they knew he was in the hospital.

Mr. FREAR. It was 8 or 10 carloads the assistant postmaster said, not tons of letters, when he testified before the Senate committee.

Mr. MANN. Very well. It may have been carloads. I do not remember. Now, I think the boys at home ought to be discharged. They are granting discharges to the boys in the camps at home very slowly. Here is a letter from a boy who is at Camp Grant—I dare not give his name:

As you know, there are many thousand boys here in our camps who are not doing a hand of work, not even earning the salt they use, for the Government, but yet are wasting valuable time which they might be utilizing to the interest of their family or themselves. This does not seem hardly fair, that these men should be held here in the Army when they have their future to look forward to. For the War Department to hold these men any longer is outrageous. I for one haven't done a lick of work for the last two months, but yet when I apply for discharge I am only refused and told that my services are needed in the work of demobilization of other troops, and the only thing I am needed for is to eat three meals a day and sleep. Now, if any fair-minded man can show me any reason for such kid's play, I am willing to keep quiet about it and stay for as long a time as Mr. Baker or any of his gang wants me to, but I am not willing to stay here doing nothing for my country and losing plenty for myself and probably my family future. Are not we deserving of an immediate discharge when our services are not needed? But that may be all true enough, but like all Army regulations the officers say it is an order, and so it will have to be carried out. The personnel officer of this camp says that there must be 17,000 men retained here for demobilization work. Now, anyone with an ounce of sense will readily see that there is no need of that many men to discharge 1,500 men a day. So, under such regulations, we soldiers that have been unfortunate enough to be assigned to what our personnel officer has classed as permanent units are held and will be held until the middle of summer or four months after peace has been signed. There are too many officers in our Army of to-day who now have the best position they ever had, and do not want to discharge their men, as they want to hold on to the soft snap as long as possible. Are you men who sent us here going to stand for such a condition as this? We have given up everything to go forth and fight for fairness and justice. Now show us, by the use of your good office, that you intend for every man to get a square deal.

I have had a great many letters from boys in camps similar to that. Nothing to do in camp, with an opportunity to take a good position at home. And they are not discharged, and you can not get any information from the War Department about the cases, or if they answer a letter, as they probably will, they answer with a form letter, a form letter giving no information.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. And it takes six months to get that.

Mr. MANN. They are making no effort to let these boys out who have got jobs awaiting them and who want to go to work. I have letters from men in all branches of the service, a whole lot of them here. I have not the time to read them, because I want to read to the House a letter received from one of the boys at Brest, if I have the time, and I want to say in connection with the conditions at Brest, I have made some inquiry about the matter, and the conditions there are not the fault of the men in charge at Brest. The conditions there are the fault of the Army, the General Staff here in Washington. This is dated:

BREST, FRANCE, December 17, 1918.

SWEETEST MOTHER: It would take volumes to tell you of the trip here and another set of classics to tell about the horrors of Brest. The famous 5-foot shelf of Harvard classics would hardly suffice. If I dared use such language as the men use, I'd probably be thrown out of the Army for abuse of the mails and disowned by you, but I would be better able to describe Brest.

Imagine 600 hungry men, tired out from four days in what are known as "eight-forties" (chevaux and hommes, respectively), with an 85-pound sack on their backs, a heavy overcoat, heavy underwear, heavy "arctic" overshoes, detraining in the dark, marching 4½ miles in mud that kept getting deeper and deeper! Finding all Army tents pitched in the mud, having to sleep in the selfsame mud that night, and finding the next day that they had to eat in centralized kitchens, waiting in line from an hour to an hour and a half to get chow, and, having gotten it, finding that it was impossible even for a hungry man to eat it!

And I may say that this letter is absolutely a private letter and never expected to see public light—

There must be between 40,000 and 60,000 men here. Transportation is so scarce that water carts are hauled by details of 14 men. Our outfits haven't any cart. We send details with the men's canteens to get water. There are no latrines. Big cans (galvanized iron) are set along the roadsides for the men to defecate in. Every few hundred yards—perhaps every quarter of a mile—there is a row of these cans. The smell is fierce. Trenches are dug near every outfit for urinating. The camp is so crowded that there seems to be no head or tail to anything. From 11 until 2, from 4 till 7, the roads are packed with men and officers trying to get chow. I've dipped my mess kit into "suds 'n' rinser" together with lieutenant colonels, who were just as vociferously damning the whole place as the loudest second lieutenant. Men are only allowed to take one pair of shoes to the States. Their outfits may have been here for weeks, all prepared to embark four days after their arrival here. These men have nothing but wet shoes and wet socks to wear, and can't get anything else—

A General Staff regulation—

To-day two colonels inspected the mess. They came a whole hour before the terrible mob scene. They will report "everything lovely."

This morning I was down at headquarters, over a mile from where our part of the camp is. This headquarters group used to be all the camp there was here. Now it is just about big enough, with a lot of wooden shacks added, to house the necessary offices. Troops and mud, troops and mud—more mud and then some more—everywhere. And thousands more arriving daily—not mud, but troops. When Mr. Wilson arrived at this port they hustled him aboard a train. I wish he could have waded incog. through this camp. To cap the climax, it rains every half hour. Then the sun shines; then the sky clouds up and it gets awfully chilly. You always have to have your raincoat with you, and when it isn't raining you suffocate from just carrying it. There's no use trying to dodge the mud holes. If you don't step in them, some one else will and slop it all over you, or a truck will go splashing through with "a bone in her teeth," throwing mud for 10 feet on either side. You can't tell where the holes are, for the whole road is a pool of liquid mud. The traffic of trucks and soldiers, and soldiers pulling water carts, prisoners loading defecating cans onto trucks, is a mad whirl of mud, men, and smells. It reminded me of the crowd leaving the ball game, if the game were played in the slums of garbage row and the fans all wore khaki. To-day I helped a major carry his own bedding roll for half a mile!

There is not enough truckage so that individual units can run their own mess. The men are scurrying the country roundabout the camp for loaves of French bread, cans of sardines, anything they can get, to fill out the voids in their stomachs. If the American Expeditionary Forces are demobilized through Brest and the present conditions keep up, there will never be another draft put over in the States nor will any of these men ever volunteer.

Brest is the greatest antimilitary argument in the whole, wide, wide world. The situation is just not handled at all. The men came to me to-day. "Lieutenant, how about our mess fund?" I had to tell them that when we arrived they took our field kitchen away from us, so we couldn't cook; there was no wood to be had, and no trucks to haul fuel if we could get it—no trucks to haul food. But to-morrow I'm going to take 40 or 50 men with me to the sales commissary and buy enough stuff so we can serve our own breakfasts—cold, it's true, but we can heat coffee and can give men enough to start the day on.

We'll probably all of us have the most miserable Christmas in our existence if we stay here. I can't imagine a worse hole than this—and we have a so-called War College to teach officers how to handle such a situation. I hope they court-martial me for this letter—perhaps the information I could divulge would open the eyes of a few of the officials in the Capitol, who hear nothing but flowery tales of the American Expeditionary Forces.

And now, sweet mother, it's time for me to kick in. Thank God, I've got my bedding roll with me and haven't as yet lost the blankets.

Good night, and love, love, love—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask leave to insert these letters complete——

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman desire any more time?

Mr. MANN. I would not like to take more time; I do not want to take time away from gentlemen who desire time. However, I will take two minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not want to take time away from other gentlemen.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can yield back the time if he does not need it.

Mr. MANN. I know a boy, a brigadier general, who was reported to be in charge at Brest, an officer of the Marine Corps. I know him well; I have known him since he was a small boy. I learned that he did one thing, probably many more like it; he took the hay the Army had sent for the horses and gave it to the boys to lay on the mud that they might lie on the hay. I do not know whether they will court-martial him for that or not. They had no nurses at this camp. This boy, Brig. Gen. Butler, had 2,000 marines there, and he put them at work taking care of the sick who came there. They had influenza at the camp. These marines took the men, carried them directly from the train to the camp and laid them on the hay. They fed them, took care of them, and were acting as nurses for them. Lo and behold! an order came to ship these marines and scatter them through camps throughout France. They were there acting, and willing to act, as nurses, and they were ordered away where they had nothing to do but kill time, and the men who were sick were required to wait on each other. Who can imagine a more brutal and inefficient service than that? [Applause.] There can be no excuse for it. We, we of this body, forced the men into the Army by the draft. It is true many of them volunteered, but we forced them into the Army. We knew they would undergo hardships, perhaps lose their lives, perhaps lose their limbs, but we intended and put into the law that they might give part of their pay to their dependents at home and the Government would supplement that. That has not been done. We guaranteed to them that we would give them as good protection as could be given to them while in the Army, and we have utterly failed as a Government to carry out our promise. If there was to be a new war to-day, after these boys come home, it would not be so easy to get a new army if the same Army officials were to be in charge of the Army. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. GOOD. I was wondering if the gentleman knew anything about the practice that is indulged in here in Washington in regard to St. Elizabeths? Everybody knows that is an institution for the insane, and I was told by a man just back from France that in the insane ward there a great many boys who had come back a little nervous because of shell shock were put along in the same ward with men who are insane, and had been insane for years, are incurable, and they are all in the same wards together.

Mr. MANN. Well, there are so many things being done that are incomprehensible that I sometimes wonder if the men in charge of the War Department have utterly lost sight of what is known as common sense——

Mr. FREAR. And humanity.

Mr. DYER. Is there not something that Congress can do to remedy the situation?

Mr. MANN. I think there might be, but I do not know.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me to direct an inquiry to the chairman? May I inquire of the gentleman having the bill in charge as to what his desire is as to yielding time? There are many men on ths side who would like to hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] speak on the league of nations, and I would like to accommodate them so far as to give them notice as to when he will be recognized.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That, of course, depends on the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know whether the gentleman desires recognition after the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] concludes or not.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I take it that we will alternate in the time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I give notice that I will next yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, the recital of the story by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was most interesting and heart appealing, but it is not new to most of us. We all have heard the things which he has heard, and some of us have heard of even more outrageous things than he has told us. Delayed mail, mistaken reports of casualties, and various other lapses of the War Department have been told to every Member of this House in his daily mail. When a distinguished Member of the other branch said that the War Department had failed to function because we were at war, he was assailed in a certain part of the public press from Maine to California; but when he said that the War Department had failed to function he told a whole lot of truth. [Applause.] And his direct attack on that department awoke the country and the department so that it proceeded to function in part.

Mr. Chairman, what will the men of this Congress say when they hear the story of an entire division of American boys, the first National Guard unit in this country to leave our shores and fight in every fight since February, 1918, beginning at Chemin des Dames, and who were at Soissons, Apremont, Seicheprey, Flirey, Xivray, Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, Belleau Wood, Verdun, and the Argonne Forest? Twenty-six thousand men left New England in September, 1917; in February, 1918, these boys went into the trenches; and on November 11, 1918, a shattered remnant came out of the trenches. Thirteen thousand casualties occurred in the "Yankee Division." Think of it, men of America! Five hundred and sixty boys of a regiment, the One hundred and first Infantry, formerly the Ninth Massachusetts, and of the Fifth Massachusetts, and of the Sixth Massachusetts, sleep their last long sleep under the blood-soaked fields of France; 2,300 of those boys wounded—arm off, leg off, eye out, gassed—oh, I can not go on!

And on the 6th of November, 1918, the colonel of that regiment, who had stood with his boys from September, 1917, until November 1, 1918, shoulder to shoulder with them in the trench and in combat, was relieved of his regiment to make way for a dandy pet of the Leavenworth clique.

Mr. BUTLER. I have had the same experience.

Mr. GALLIVAN. You have all the same story of what has happened to the commanding officers of regiments which went out in the National Guard, because, forsooth, some one in authority did not believe that the man from your State, and from your State, yes, and from your State [pointing], and from my State, who went out as colonel or major in authority, just as well versed in modern warfare, as exemplified on the battle fields of France, as a graduate of West Point or of Leavenworth, was the kind of fellow that the Regular Army colonel wanted to rub elbows with or get the glory that comes out of war. They were all right for months, when the shells were shrieking and the "H. E.'s" exploding; but just like the last quarter of a football game, when the whistle is about to blow, and the ball is on the 1-yard line ready to go over, they take out these gallant officers from the National Guard in this country and they hand the commission and the salary that goes with the job to some fellow who never engaged with combat troops in all the period of the war.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there be any man who doubts what I have said, I am going to ask at a later date that this entire thing be investigated by this body. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me to add here that the same occurrence, the same facts, occurred with a soldier in my congressional district? The day before the armistice was signed they removed him and sent him home, after being in continuous battle for four months as the captain in an artillery regiment.

Mr. GALLIVAN. One of the finest men in Texas was removed under similar conditions; two splendid colonels in Missouri were removed; a brigadier general from Pennsylvania was removed under similar conditions. And then, if you ask the Secretary of War for an explanation, you are told that he has nothing to do with it; that Gen. Pershing is in complete authority; and if you ask him the second time for some other information he gets peeved. He does not like to be cross-examined. [Laughter.] And his Chief of Staff—why, I read with amusing interest what my good friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said the other day about the Chief of Staff and his upstart aide. And since then I have had a similar experience. I asked him politely when the division to which I have referred—the Yankee Division—which has been in France since September 23, 1917, and which is now stranded in France, would be permitted to come back to the States. Remember, Mr. Chairman, that the division of which I speak has been longer in France than any other division, with the single exception of the troops that went over, at the beginning of our entrance into the conflict, with Gen. Pershing. Ninety-six hundred men have passed through one regiment, with whose work I am more familiar than with the work of other regiments in that division. Think of it! The war strength of a regiment is 3,650, and 9,600 men have passed through the One hundred and first Infantry from February to November. And I asked when these boys, what is left of them, would be permitted to come home.

I directed my inquiry to Gen. March, and I wrote on the outside of the envelope the words "Personal; special attention of Gen. March." [Laughter.] I received a reply on Saturday, in which I was informed by one Swing, a major in the National Army, that—

> Gen. March directs me to say to you that the Twenty-sixth Division is not on priority and will not be placed there until Gen. Pershing decides to place it there. Any other information on this division will be furnished you through the press.

[Laughter.] That is the gospel truth, gentlemen. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. You have got to read it in the newspapers.

Mr. GALLIVAN. That is the gospel truth. Well, I wrote the heroic Gen. March, and I told him that if he tried to ignore me he was not going to get away with it. [Applause.] I repeated my inquiry, and I said to him, "Now, you tell me it is up to Pershing. I want to ask you how I can reach Gen. Pershing." I had written him two or three letters since this war started, and I wrote at the suggestion of the War Department, and until this hour I have never received a reply from Gen. Pershing or from any member of his numerous and highly tailored staff [laughter], which from the inception of the conflict has slept comfortably in Chaumont and Tours.

So that, Mr. Chairman, while I had not the faintest intention of referring to this matter in the time allotted to me in this debate, I could not keep quiet after listening to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], when I had the story and knew it to be true and wanted to share some little part of it with Congress. I do not desire any publicity about this matter, gentleman. But I dare say I will get a little bit on account of some things I have said. [Laughter.]

I want to say to the practical politicians in Congress that I would not wish my political enemy any more harm than that he should select for high public preferment one or two of the so-called great generals who are abroad and who have never even seen a combat. [Laughter.] I mention no names. [Laughter.] I have talked with the boys, and there is not one of them—no, not one of them—that has either affection or respect for the two or three that I have in mind. [Applause.] Now, Mr. Chairman, Congress ought to do something. Congress, through its Military Committee or through its leaders, ought to do something, and it ought to do it on a nonpartisan basis. There ought not to be any politics in it. [Applause.] Remember, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, that a great many of these boys were shoved into the Army. They were good men. The boys for whom I speak volunteered. They were in the Massachusetts Volunteer Militia. They were only home a short time from a six-months' tour of duty on the Mexican border, and they went to France, and I am proud to say this word: They went to France, the first State unit to go from this country, because they were the first State unit ready. Honest to God, they taught Regular Army men at their elbows how to do things. [Applause.] They taught them how to take care of themselves. They had an intelligent leader. Col. Logan was the peer of any officer. They were good boys from good families, and those of them who still survive are over there yet. There has not been a day since they were placed at this so-called rest camp when from two to six of them have not died from illness in some hospital.

Of course, their mothers and their fathers want the boys to come back. But for the first time I am beginning to hear from the boys themselves that they would like to come back. They have been there now since September, 1917. That is a long, long time. They have seen their comrades go over the top and into the mouth of hell and they have buried them in France, and now, with the fighting over, their minds go back to the early days when they talked with one another as to what the future had in store, and then they count over the list of those who were their tent mates, and they find that they have gone—"gone west"—and the boys who survive would like to come home.

What is Congress going to do about it? Is it going to allow the Secretary of War to "pass the buck" to Pershing? Is it going to allow the handsome Chief of Staff to "pass the buck" to Pershing? What are we elected for? I respectfully submit that I hope my words will be thought over after you gentlemen have left the Chamber. I confess that I do not feel powerfully important enough to start such an investigation as I would like to see begun, but unless some big fellow does it, a little fellow like myself will undertake it. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Yesterday we passed a bill through this House giving the Commander in Chief of the Army $100,000,000 to be spent as he saw fit. Does not the gentleman think that some of the arguments he has made here to-day would have had greater effect if we had had this knowledge? And does he not fear that, the President of the United States being Commander in Chief of the Army and having control of the Secretary of War, there is a possibility of as many mistakes being made in the expenditure of this $100,000,000 which the Congress saw fit to give him yesterday as have taken place in the management of the Army?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Oh, anything is likely to happen; but that has not anything to do with this case whatever.

Mr. SNYDER. It seems to me it has.

Mr. GALLIVAN. And the question has no place in my remarks.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GALLIVAN. If it has to do with my remarks, gladly.

Mr. LITTLE. I think it has.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I will decide that point. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLE. The day before this you allowed the War Department the same authority to spend $4,000,000,000. Is it not possible that there might be as many mistakes in the expenditure of that $4,000,000,000 as in the expenditure of the $100,000,000?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes; if it has any bearing on what I am talking about.

Mr. DYER. Will not the gentleman state what his idea and suggestion is as to what we, the Congress, can do to help in this deplorable situation of which he and the gentleman from Illinois talked this morning?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I have an idea that either the Committee on Military Affairs or a special committee appointed by the Chair, with equal representation from the two political parties, should at once conduct such an investigation as I have referred to, begin taking evidence here, and then go abroad and visit in France every outfit that has a complaint and that wants to be heard.

Mr. DYER. I take it from the gentleman's remarks that he thinks it should be composed of Members of both branches of Congress.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Exactly.

Mr. DYER. Of both political parties.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Exactly, in equal numbers.

Mr. DYER. I advocate that, and suggest that the gentleman urge such a proposition on the Democratic leaders of this Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The gentleman has spoken of one colonel of this Twenty-sixth Division being relieved of his command. Can he give us any information as to how many other officers with this division have been relieved?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I can, and I am glad the gentleman has asked the question. The colonel whom I had in mind was from my own city, and he is my next-door neighbor. He was the longest-in-service colonel in command of a regiment now in France when relieved, a distinguished graduate of Harvard College, who left Harvard in 1898 to go into the Spanish War as a boy, and he has been a soldier ever since. He gave up his place on the bench to go to France, and he led as brave an outfit as ever left America. He is the man that went into the trenches and into the gutters night after night with his boys; and just before the bell rang, when everything was safe, he was relieved of his command, and it was not given to his lieutenant colonel, mark you, noble Jack Greenaway, whom most of you have heard of. Jack Greenaway was with Col. Roosevelt in the Spanish War. He was a Yale man, a great athlete, and a wonderful fellow. In August last he became lieutenant colonel of the One hundred and first Infantry and a loyal aid to Col. Logan. The command was not given to Jack Greenaway, the colonel's assistant, but it was given to a Regular Army officer.

The gentleman from Maine asks me if I know about any other colonel. The colonel of the Maine outfit was removed even later, another gallant New Englander, Col. Hume, with a splendid career in the service of his State and of his country, and a brigadier general from my State, in command of the Fifty-second Brigade, was relieved of his command, and Maj. Gen. Clarence R. Edwards—God bless his name [applause]—who went to France in charge of this division, was sent home in September because he refused to do the dirty work. [Applause.] That is the story, gentlemen. He was told to his face by a whipper-snapper chief of staff of the Twenty-sixth Division named Duncan K. Major, a lieutenant colonel, "If you don't get these National Guardsmen, we will get you." And they got Clarence Edwards; but, as I said before, he refused to do their dirty work, and when he came to Boston he owned that town, and as long as he lives he will have a place in the hearts of New England second to no other man. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course, the country knew very well that Gen. Clarence Edwards had been sent home; but did I understand the gentleman to say that he was threatened with dismissal if he did not get these National Guardsmen?

Mr. GALLIVAN. The man who threatened him had no power of dismissal, but he had the power of scheming and of "framing" and of misrepresentation. You know that the chief of staff of a division is a pretty powerful fellow. In most instances he runs the division. The major general does not always run it. I am not yet permitted to give to the public my authority for the statement that this chief of staff had said to Gen. Edwards, "If you do not get these National Guardsmen, we will get you," but they "got" Clarence Edwards. He is back in Boston once more at the head of the Northeastern Division, and I have no doubt that when all the boys come back home we shall hear more about it. The boys will be discharged and they will be home some day, but I want to see this thing all come out, and I want the deserving brigadier general and the colonels to whom I have referred restored to their commands, and I want to see tribute paid, at least by the Congress of the United States, to the wonderful sacrifices which each and every one of them has made. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that probably another reason——

Mr. GALLIVAN. Has the gentleman a question to ask me? I can not yield for a statement.

Mr. LITTLE. I will put it in the form of a question. Does the gentleman know that Gen. Clarence Edwards was out of fashion with that clique for another reason—that is, that he was a fighting soldier instead of an expert? He was with Lawton in the Philippines, and before this war began had fought in more fights and commanded more troops in action than any major general that went to France. For that reason he was a little unfashionable. And I can add a little to the gentleman's statement of facts by saying that the week before he sailed he said to me that he proposed to get either a bullet or a promotion. I am sure he tried hard for both. It is a subject of great regret to me that he did not get the promotion. I sympathize with the gentleman. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. I understand from what the gentleman from Kansas has said and from my own knowledge that Gen. Edwards is just as he has described him. He was a fighting general and he saw combat and participated in combat, and few of these other fellows did, and do not you get bluffed when they come back home. Many of them do not know a "77" from a "dud," if you know what a "dud" is. It is a flivver explosive and most of the petted favorites would run away from a baked apple hurled in their direction. [Laughter.] Now, I have finished what has come to me on the spur of the moment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me now?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. You know the Secretary of War stated that it was the intention to leave 32 divisions, or more than a million and a quarter of men, in Europe. Does the gentleman approve of that?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I do not approve it, and the gentleman reminds me of something else in connection with this division. It was picked for the army of occupation, and when its new major general looked it over he found that the boys were all in. And I might say to my California friends and to my Wisconsin friends in this House that to-day that division is composed in the main of California and Wisconsin troops. We have some from Illinois, quite a few, but New England has less than 20 per cent of the division, and when picked to be a part of the army of occupation the new division commander, on report from brigade commanders, threw up his hands—the boys were gone, physically gone. Then they took their equipment away and they gave it to other troops which were going into the army of occupation. The newspaper correspondents have written home to Boston, and their language, Mr. Chairman, has been allowed to pass through the censors' hands, and according to them the boys of the Twenty-sixth New England Division, the Yankee Division, were left stranded at Montigny le Roi. There they are now, stranded. When I asked the Chief of Staff what he could tell me in reply to the newspaper stories, his upstart aide tells me nothing—"Read the papers," and I have read them. The papers tell me the division is stranded, and out of the One hundred and first Infantry, when it went to France, three-quarters of the boys came from my district. I knew every company commander, and, by God, I am going to see that that regiment is treated right—what is left of it. [Great applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him one other question?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Gladly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will not the gentleman also agree with me that none but those who volunteer especially for that purpose ought to be kept in Europe now?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I am hardly prepared to answer that question. I do believe they could get enough volunteers.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GALLIVAN. To take care of that work.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. From those on this side and on the other.

Mr. GALLIVAN. And I believe that system ought to be tried out. I do believe we perhaps ought to try the volunteer system and that they would get more than enough.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that the Military Committee now has before it a bill for that purpose.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I rose as a member of the Committee on Appropriations to discuss this bill, and that is the reason I asked for 40 minutes. What I have to say should be in no way a reflection on the committee or the hard-working subcommittee which has been hearing heads of departments since the 23d of November, and which has finally completed its report, which comes to us in the form of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the next fiscal year. The information that I have has come to me since the committee has finished its hearings, and that must be my apology to my excellent friend, the hard-working chairman, for not having brought this matter to his attention and to the attention of his associates.

THE BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY.

It seems an inescapable part of the natural order of things that about every decade some big new idea should suddenly capture public fancy. For a time it enjoys a startling vogue, and during its destined hour woe be unto him who questions or challenges. Now one thing, then another, but always its pretensions are paraded as something just a little short of a universal panacea for human ills. Then, almost overnight the illusion collapses or subsides into sober moderation, permitting those remaining sane while the craze was at its flood to venture out of their retreats to hold an orderly autopsy over the remains.

Naturally, the big idea possesses a certain merit, else it could not hold public attention. Taking this element of truth for a foundation, thereupon is reared some wonderful and fantastic philosophy that claims everything, cures everything.

An army of suddenly converted zealots sing its praises, the idea swells to the proportions of a crusade sweeping aside with arrogant intolerance all opposition and purposely perverting and misinterpreting any honest inquiry, until one excess after another is committed under the cloak of its pretended virtues. What little merit the idea held at the beginning is tortured by its bigoted followers out of all its original shape or understanding.

Something like this has been the history of the big idea of "efficiency." Some few years ago this new thought of efficiency, with its concommitant, all-embracing philosophy, suddenly projected itself across the people's vision, and for a time occupied the center of the stage. Just exactly what the term "efficiency" really meant no one dared press to an answer unless he was willing to be listed as an undesirable citizen and the motives that prompted the inquiry malevolently misconstrued. It is true that some one has aptly defined "efficiency" as doing the right thing at the right time with the least possible effort, and while this definition rings pleasing to the ear, still it throws little additional light upon the subject. The term and its definition could readily be interpreted to suit individual tastes.

Anyway, the idea grew. It became the style. New ideals were invoked and the Mecca of individual development which marked the superman was to achieve 100 per cent efficiency. No one could say that efficiency was not a good thing, the public voted that it was, and its popularity grew apace. True enough, the country needed to apply its principles. We had grown too loose in our business methods. There was too much waste. The general idea was sound.

But just here is where trouble begins. Because the acknowledged utility of the general idea of efficiency had won approving prominence made it possible to foist on the public all sorts of contraptions, prompted under its fair name. Then, too, so-called efficiency experts without a shred of business experience; self-centered theorists, whose life had spelled failure written large; fakirs, charlatans, and adventurers, each with some plausible sophistry to exploit, now appeared on the scene to persuasively urge some new-fangled efficiency device or system, certain to save an incalculable amount of time, money, and labor. Efficiency experiments became the order of the day.

As a rule these experiments met with painful failure. Generally speaking, their glib promoters have been discredited and forgotten. The devices and systems they offered were all right in theory, only they would not work in practice. Their memory lingers, however, and in this fact lies danger, because where yesterday the term "efficiency" was a name to conjure with, now, in the light of our unfortunate experiences, with an invasion of efficiency experts, we are just as likely to swing to the other extreme, forgetting the fundamental virtues that efficiency holds and its imperative need in all well-ordered business. But, first, we should have no cloudy conception of its meaning and we should be sane about it. In no quarter is the application of its sober principles more necessary than in the work of the Government, and I propose to briefly review our experiences along the line of efficiency in the administration of Government business. A Bureau of Efficiency in connection therewith is now and for some time has been in operation, and I deem the occasion timely to speak frankly and plainly about its activities because the record of this bureau offers little hope of encouragement to those who long to see Government work conducted on a practical business basis.

Some six or seven years ago the late Senator Aldrich was credited with a statement which at that time received wide publicity, wherein he charged that $300,000,000 was annually wasted in the Government's expenditures which could be saved through the application of ordinary business methods. It is certain that this statement sank deep in the public mind and doubtless contributed much to legislation that followed. The efficiency idea was about this time blossoming into prominence, and, knowing full well that there was much room for improvement in administrative methods, a sentiment in Congress developed favoring the creation of some sort of an agency intended to institute efficiency methods in the various departments.

Accordingly on March 25, 1913, the Division of Efficiency was created, with a chief at $4,000 a year, to which was later added a staff of five persons, beginning with an expert investigator at $3,000 and closing with a messenger at $600 per annum. Mr. Herbert D. Brown was named as chief of this division, a position which, through all the varying fortunes of the enterprise, he still retains. The Division of Efficiency, in its initial operation, was tacked onto the United States Civil Service Commission. Just exactly what its duties were supposed to be, the evidence at hand fails to disclose, nor is much light thrown on the subject by a careful reading of the several annual reports of the Civil Service Commission covering the two or three year period this connection continued. In the beginning much was said about efficiency rating of civil-service employees, and it was assumed that the standardization of some such system was the main purpose for which the Division of Efficiency was created.

On page 13 of the thirty-first report of the Civil Service Commission, 1913–14, appears the following statement, which gives some clue of what the Division of Efficiency was expected to accomplish:

WORK OF THE DIVISION OF EFFICIENCY.

Under the acts of August 23, 1912, and March 4, 1913, the duty was laid upon the commission of instituting systems of efficiency ratings for the personnel of the service and also of investigating and reporting to the President, with its recommendations as to the administrative needs of the service relating to personnel.

Presumably, this was the chief work of the Division of Efficiency at the outset, but apparently it fell down on the job. Continuing, this report adds:

At the outset it became clear that any system of efficiency ratings for the personnel of a given office would be of little value if subsequent investigations of the administrative methods of the office disclosed the advisability of changing the methods.

In other words, there was little work for the Division of Efficiency here, so other tasks must be found for these efficiency experts, which vaguely are referred to as "a study of administrative methods." Just what this term means is not quite clear nor is further information disclosed in the brief reference to Mr. Herbert D. Brown and his division, although from time to time we have been assured by excellent gentlemen on the floor of Congress that great and good work was being done.

Evidently some one was favorably impressed or else Mr. Brown was exceedingly busy with his friends in Congress. His importance grew apace, and on March 4, 1915, an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill provided that the Chief of the Division of Efficiency shall be appointed and shall report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session, through the President, the nature and progress of the work undertaken and the results accomplished. What work, if any, was performed in the two years preceding the record fails to disclose. Nevertheless, again on February 28, 1916, another amendment, this time tacked on to the urgent deficiency bill, provided for an independent bureau, and thus the Division of Efficiency grew to the Bureau of Efficiency.

"Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed, that he is grown so great?" From a small beginning in a few short years there rises an independent bureau; a bureau, too, which, from all available reports, has absolutely nothing to offer in justification for its existence during the preceding years, but hides its impotence under the glare of the magic word "efficiency." Only one scant mention, and this in the thirty-third report of the Civil Service Commission, and that publishing the divorce and announcing that hereafter Mr. Herbert D. Brown and his efficiency trappings would keep house by themselves. But no mention of any work performed, good, bad, or indifferent.

That was in 1916. Since that time one report has been issued by the Bureau of Efficiency, a small pamphlet of some 1,500 words, reading matter, and the remaining space devoted to a lengthy roster of employees and a recapitulation of the salaries paid. In this brief report the following ingenious alibi is offered for nonperformance of duty:

During the past year the Bureau of Efficiency has not departed from the principles which have governed its procedure from its inception in March, 1913. It has stood not for publicity, but for results. It does not publish reports except when required by Congress to do so.

Could a more illuminating explanation be offered? Instituting a widely heralded system of efficiency and then shrinking from publicity after five long years of experimenting. Setting forth full of promise and with an ambitious program, this Bureau of Efficiency now modestly hides its head when called on to proclaim its achievements. Results, indeed! Let us see what they are.

Evidently Mr. Brown is not so certain about the matter himself. Quoting from his report we find him treating the subject in the following hesitating language:

Much of the work of the Bureau of Efficiency during the past year will not produce savings, except, indirectly, through better administration. Nevertheless the actual savings resulting from the work by the bureau during the year would seem to justify the cost of its maintenance.

"Would seem to justify the cost of its maintenance" is a faint echo of the confident promises that paved the way for the creation of the bureau. One thing is certain: There is no "seems" about the increasing expense involved in its administration. The first year some 5 employees were sufficient; last year there was a total of 49. From an annual expense of $15,000 this cost has jumped to $100,000, practically all for the payment of salaries. This year it reaches the fine sum of $125,000, and it is still on the way up. According to the testimony of Efficiency Expert Brown, the pay roll for permanent employees amounted last year to $80,000 and for temporary employees $23,000. Even in these days of billions, the sum total spent on this experimental bureau will make an imposing figure.

Meanwhile the results are negligible. In fact, of all the jobs assigned to this Bureau of Efficiency by Congress only one, and that a report on work performed by Subtreasuries, seems to have been fully completed. Even in this instance, little in the way of concrete results has followed the recommendations of Mr. Brown.

On every other job the Bureau of Efficiency has either lagged lamentably or completely fallen down. This statement is abundantly confirmed by a review of the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations of the House, where, despite insistent instructions from Congress, Mr. Brown was unable to make a complete or even partial report on the several tasks assigned the bureau. Among these assignments was one to examine and audit claims; another to investigate the methods employed by the Civil Service Commission; another to submit comparative tables showing the rate of pay granted for similar work to Government and private employees; another to ascertain and submit to Congress a compilation showing the prospective cost of various old-age retirement plans for civil-service employees. The hearings before the House Appropriations Committee of January 7, 1918, disclose that little, if any, progress was or had been made on these several items, and it is doubtful if any worth mentioning has been made since. After more than a year's delay and after much heckling and prodding, a very limited compilation of figures of doubtful accuracy relative to the prospective cost of a retirement plan has been submitted, but utterly without any explanatory data or advice, as would be naturally expected.

Compared to the large appropriation voted for its maintenance, nothing worth mentioning has been accomplished by the Bureau of Efficiency in the more than five years it has existed. And yet Mr. Brown complains that "unless our force is substantially increased we will not be able to do it"—referring to the several tasks assigned and unfinished by this bureau. It is Congress that wants results, and Mr. Brown replies with a plea for more money. So lamentable was the condition as disclosed at these hearings that Mr. Brown was moved to admit at the conclusion, "We have spent most of our time at this hearing in apologizing for not finishing certain work." In the light of these revelations, the "Bureau of Inefficiency" would be a more fitting designation.

And the testimony at these hearings discloses more. It showed that while the Bureau of Efficiency pretended to be busy introducing systems of scientific management in other departments, it, in fact, reveals an appalling lack of system in managing its own affairs.

Its reports are beyond understanding, and the references made to the work it is supposed to be performing are couched in the vaguest terms when, indeed, it makes any reference at all. It fails to complete its work on time or when ordered by Congress to do so. It fails to maintain any settled administrative policy or to forecast with even passing accuracy its prospective cost of maintenance. It fails to confine its own expenditures within the appropriation granted. It fails to furnish a single specific instance where it has simplified former methods or benefited administrative processes. In fact, it fails to show any good reason for its existence or why it should be designated as a bureau of efficiency. And yet this is the bureau that is presumed to tell other departments how to run their business.

Moreover, among all other departments, this bureau was the only one, as the testimony disclosed, that failed to submit its annual report on time, much less a report on any of the work it was supposed to be doing. Finally, on February 1, 1918, about two months late, a little pamphlet of 1,500 words of reading matter made its appearance, labeled "Report of the United States Bureau of Efficiency." Herein the several duties assigned the bureau by Congress are mentioned and brief excuses offered why nothing had been done. In this report Mr. Brown insists that the bureau is saving the Government money, but he explains "that much of the work of the Bureau of Efficiency during the past year will not produce savings, except indirectly through better administration." The nearest approach that can be gleaned of what Mr. Brown thinks his efficiency staff is doing and the nature of the saving effected is shown by the following extract and accompanying table taken from his annual report:

The bureau has effected annual savings of about $500,000, or nearly $9 per annum for each dollar spent once. Most of these savings will not appear as reductions in appropriations, because they have been brought about in the organization of new activities occasioned by the war. Nevertheless they represent actual money savings and the elimination of expenditures which otherwise would have been incurred for personal service and equipment.

Here follows a table showing in general terms the character and amount of the alleged savings:

Accumulated totals of savings in Government expenses from Mar. 25, 1913, to June 30, 1918, that have been accomplished by the Bureau of Efficiency.

	1913–14	1914–15	1915–16	1916–17	1917–18	Total.
Estimates for increased appropriations withdrawn	.....	$50,000	$51,000	$62,000	$50,000	$213,000
Estimates reduced below previous appropriations	.....	38,000	87,300	151,490	217,199	493,989
Saving in floor space, at 50 cents a foot	.....	.....	1,300	2,950	2,950	7,200
Increase in clerical labor and printing avoided	$100,000	100,000	115,600	130,600	561,356	1,007,556
Increase in postal revenue	.....	.....	17,500	30,000	30,000	77,500
Intention to increase estimates abandoned	.....	.....	6,200	6,200	6,200	18,600
Reduction in work offset by increases in other work of office	.....	.....	.....	.....	57,000	57,000
Work reduced, but no reduction in estimates	.....	.....	.....	10,000	10,000	20,000
Total	100,000	188,000	278,900	393,240	934,696	1,894,836

An ordinary, careful examination of the foregoing tables will reveal the indefinite character of the alleged savings. They are not savings that will be reflected in reduced appropriations. Mr. Brown admits as much. There is no statement showing in what department this saving occurred or just how it was brought about. Neither was there any explanation of the character of these several items offered at the hearings, and it is well to recall at this juncture that the annual report of this bureau did not make its appearance until long after the Appropriations Committee had completed its annual budget. In the light of its other known delinquencies, it is a matter of grave doubt whether these so-called savings will pass muster under careful inquiry. In fact, it is quite unlikely that there has been any saving at all. The whole business bears a curious aspect.

In a concluding portion of Mr. Brown's testimony at the hearings of January 7, 1918, the following passages occur:

Mr. VARE. When was this department organized?
Mr. BROWN. In the spring of 1913.
Mr. VARE. Can you point to any reduction in any one year in the cost of running the Government?
Mr. BROWN. Oh, yes, sir.
Mr. VARE. I mean as a whole.
Mr. BROWN. Well, of course, we can not cover the whole Government, but the offices in which we have worked there has been a substantial reduction.

"In the offices which we have worked there has been a substantial reduction," pleads Mr. Brown. Let us see. Let us note how this general statement squares with the record. Let us trace the history of "Expert" Brown's Division of Efficiency in the light of the evidence disclosed at the several hearings in the intervening time.

THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

The Division of Efficiency began its work early in 1913 as a part of the Civil Service Commission. Its duties, we gather, in keeping with Mr. Brown's alluring prospectus, were to ihstitute a system of efficiency ratings for Government employees and to install modern administrative methods for handling Government business.

No sooner, it seems, had the Division of Efficiency been added to the Civil Service Commission than trouble broke out. Mr. McIlhenny, president of the commission, and Mr. Brown, chief of the division, could not agree, with the result that efficiency ratings and modern methods marked time while the controversy raged.

As Mr. McIlhenny considerately testifies, this difference in opinion was due to "my idea at that time that we should formulate a system of efficiency ratings which we could throw over all the departments as a blanket," while Mr. Brown strongly took the stand that a reorganization of methods and a general reclassification of salaries must come first. The entire service, according to the Brown idea, it appears, must be completely revolutionized before his efficiency system would fit, which it is well to note in passing was quite an ambitious program. This contention over efficiency methods was sufficient, however, to block progress, and little, if any, was made. It is further evident that the Civil Service Commission were little impressed with the efficiency ideas of Mr. Brown.

THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Anyway, nothing seems to have been accomplished along the lines of efficiency ratings until about two years later—sometime during the summer of 1915—when Mr. Brown suggested the establishment of a system of efficiency ratings in the War Department. Again the Civil Service Commission vetoed the project. This time President McIlhenny explains his opposition to the proposal on the ground that Expert Brown's efficiency system was still an untested experiment, and besides the necessary reorganization and reclassification of salaries had not been effective, the latter a Brown idea. Thus the Brown efficiency system was not tried out in the War Department.

THE BUREAU OF PENSIONS.

Somewhere during the intervening period, after long and thoughtful study of the subject, as Mr. Brown testifies, he made an effort to introduce a better system of handling pension checks and accounting same in the Bureau of Pensions and the Department of the Interior. The Bureau of Pensions objected; they did not take kindly to his ideas. Trouble was encountered at the very outset. Finally a conference was held in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, with the Secretary of the Interior presiding, and the Brown efficiency system was suavely and plausibly explained and apparently just as bitterly challenged. The Secretary, being in doubt, decided to refer the matter to Mr. Ryan, Comptroller of the Reclamation Service, and the result of this investigation seems to have forever put a quietus on the Brown efficiency system as far as the Bureau of Pensions was concerned. In any event, some time later, as Brown testifies, "the Commissioner of Pensions refused to permit our employees to collect any further information in his office." Thus the incident closed "without any substantial reduction of expense" in this particular office.

THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Some time early in 1914 it appears that Chief Brown, acting upon the request of the Committee on Appropriations and the Secretary of the Treasury, set out to install his efficiency system in the Treasury Department. Mr. Brown states that he worked at this job something more than a year. Mr. Malburn, former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, says it was about two years. What the Efficiency Division did or were trying to do during this period is not made clear, but it is certain that after more than a year of experimenting trouble again began brewing and no peace would come until Brown and his efficiency staff finally betook themselves from the Treasury Department. Two years' work and nothing completed is what the record shows. "They barely skimmed the surface of it," charged Assistant Secretary Malburn in the hearings of January, 1916.

The evidence indicates that this last trouble developed and kept pace with a growing conviction among Treasury officials that the Brown efficiency system was chimerical and unsafe. It was all right in theory, but it would not work in practice. Performance did not square with promise. In Mr. Malburn's testimony occurs the following statement:

When I took my present office, which was in August, 1914, the efficiency committee had already taken up the work for some time in the Treasurer's office and had prepared a table of efficiency ratings for the national bank redemption agency in the Treasurer's office, which, however, was not complete. We have never been able to get them to complete that up to date.

Expert Brown admits this charge to be true, but he seeks to explain the delinquency by shifting the burden of blame to the shoulders of the Civil Service Commission. He says:

I was unable to get the Civil Service Commission to establish efficiency records in the War Department, and therefore I thought it not worth while to attempt any efficiency records in the Treasury Department.

A curious angle of this incident, as the testimony discloses, is that Mr. Brown, when on the force of the President's Commission of Economy and Efficiency, under the Taft administration, is credited with installing an efficiency rating system for the national bank redemption agency. Five years later the system, it seems, it still unfinished, which is strange, to say the least.

This and similar friction of the same sort seems to have marked Brown's two years' experience with the Treasury Department, until, as the evidence indicates, despite the authority granted the Division of Efficiency to experiment carte blanche, an ingenious plan was devised to grease the skids and hasten their going from this department. A committee on improvement of five members, composed of Treasury officials, with Assistant Secretary Malburn as chairman, were appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of investigating conditions in the Treasury Department and, if need be, to install more efficient methods for the conduct of its business, just exactly the same work that the Brown Efficiency Division was supposed to be doing at the same time. The aims and duties of this improvement committee were illuminatingly set forth in the following testimony:

Mr. STAFFORD. How many subcommittees were there?
Mr. MALBURN. Twelve.
Mr. STAFFORD. What was their special work as originally planned by the general committee of which you were chairman?
Mr. MALBURN. Each one had certain offices in the Treasury.
Mr. STAFFORD. What was their special duty?
Mr. MALBURN. To go into the offices and investigate the methods of doing the work, with the idea of getting more efficient service.
Mr. STAFFORD. The very line of work that the efficiency commission was originally created to perform.

The appointment of this committee seems to have been the beginning of the end for Brown's Efficiency Division in the Treasury Department. Furthermore, there is reasonable ground for the presumption that the object of the improvement committee was chiefly to neutralize and limit the harm that might arise from too much experimenting. As it would naturally be expected the appointment of this committee resulted in more and still more friction, until eventually, in high resentment, Mr. Brown personally filed a protest with the Secretary of the Treasury. His reception by this official is best told in his own words:

Mr. BROWN. * * * I called on the Secretary of the Treasury and asked him, in view of the fact that we were unable to make any satisfactory arrangements with his committee, would he not permit us to go ahead independently and finish our work. He said, no; that he would not be willing; that he did not think it desirable to have two investigational organizations running neck and neck in the office at the same time.

Whereupon, in the language of Mr. Brown, the Efficiency Division withdrew from the Treasury Department. "If substantial reductions in expenses" were achieved in this instance, then certainly the department officials did not show the proper appreciation.

THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

And now, at last, where do we find it? In the Post Office Department.

Mr. MADDEN. You will find it also in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Oh, I am coming to that after a bit.

Some time early in 1915, about the close of his ill-starred two-year campaign in the Treasury Department, Chief Brown turned his attention to the Post Office Department, and here, it seems, his reception was much more cordial than in any previous assignment. Later we find Postmaster General Burleson, in the hearings before the House Appropriations Committee, graciously referring to Mr. Brown as a "member of my personnel committee in the Post Office Department." At the same time Mr. Denning, chief clerk of the Post Office Department, explains:

The committee in the Post Office Department is called the committee on personnel, as distinguished from the Division of Efficiency, as it is called in the Civil Service Commission. Mr. Brown is chief. The Civil Service Division works out the ratings, based on the law, and the committee on personnel in the Post Office Department is charged with the enforcement of those ratings, so far as the Post Office Department is concerned.

The act of August 23, 1912, was enacted into law while Mr. Burleson was a member of the Appropriations Committee of the House, and it appears that he was keenly interested at that time in the idea, and later, as Postmaster General, anxious to give the system a trial. Accordingly, as President McIlhenny, of the Civil Service Commission, testified, "the Efficiency Division therefore went in and, with Mr. Burleson's powerful assistance, has accomplished a reorganization of that department and the establishment of an efficiency system." Nevertheless, we find Mr. McIlhenny in 1916 quite dubious regarding the success of the efficiency system as installed in the Post Office Department, viewing it rather as an experiment whose worth could only be determined by the test of time. On the contrary, Mr. Brown held no such fears. "We have worked out," he said, "a system of efficiency ratings in the Post Office Department that I think is about as good as it is possible to get. The results speak for themselves."

That was in January, 1916. Since that time the efficiency system thus fastened on the Post Office has given the department the time of its life, and "the results," as Mr. Brown said, "speak for themselves," but far from the way Mr. Brown so confidently predicted.

From the day this efficiency system began operation trouble piled on trouble has accumulated for the Post Office Department. Mails have been delayed inexcusably; the service has been dislocated and at times almost demoralized; soldiers' mail, both at home and abroad, has been scattered and held up without rhyme or reason; a flood of public complaint has deluged Congress, coming from all sections of the country; and the subject has been the source of bitter debate on many occasions at both ends of the Capitol; newspaper criticism has raged, going so far as to call for the resignation of the Postmaster General; and even the postal employees sulked at their work in sullen and rebellious resentment. The results speak for themselves indeed. Confusion and chaos has been the mature flower of the Brown efficiency system in the Post Office Department, compelling finally a softened attitude of those in authority and a modification of the system itself in deference to this indignant nation-wide public clamor. In a speech I delivered in this body on May 1, 1918, the workings of this efficiency system were exposed and its claims exploded, proving it to be an utter failure in every particular. Let me now repeat one emphatic statement made at that time:

* * * Were the people familiar with the multitude of injuries they have suffered through having a commendable purpose of efficiency twisted and perverted out of all shape or meaning by a squad of egotistical, tinkering experimenters, inspired by an utterly selfish motive, they would make short shrift of them and in less time than it takes me to explain the workings of their so-called efficiency system.

The system is a hopeless financial failure, just as it is in every other way. Nothing good can be said in its defense. It is philosophically unsound, and it is based on an utter misconception of the proper relations of the post office to the people and the worker to his work. It must go.

And here I may add both Burleson and Brown ought to be thrown into the discard with it. Hasten the day!

THE WAR RISK BUREAU.

Quite recently the management of the War Risk Bureau has been the subject of bitter denunciation both in the House and in the Senate. Everybody is familiar with the subject. Incompetency, negligence, and an utter lack of system in conducting its business are alleged, and many pathetic incidents are recited showing the embarrassments and injury to soldiers and soldiers' dependents that flowed from its choked and confused administrative process. Almost unbelievable stories have been told of the demoralized condition of this bureau, which Representative MADDEN charged in an address to the House on January 2, 1919, "is a stench in the nostrils of every man that has anything to do with it." Representative RUCKER, on December 13, 1918, referred to information he had received showing where some 300,000 letters had reached this bureau, accumulating in a neglected pile, while soldiers' wives and dependents waited in vain for a reply. Much more evidence in the same strain has been filed, leaving no doubt that the indictment against this bureau was grounded on solid fact.

It is to this very bureau that Chief Brown, now of the Bureau of Efficiency, has come to climax his unusual career as an efficiency expert in the Government service. Some time in October, 1917, he was called to aid in supervising its organization work and to install efficient administrative methods. He has been there ever since. He is there now. "I hold no brief for Mr. Brown," says Representative STAFFORD in the House on December 13 in reply to the flood of criticism of the War Risk Bureau, "but I do know they are employing clerks by the thousands in order to pay the allotments and pay the insurance that will come due and the compensation to those that have been injured."

Yet this is the same Bureau of Efficiency, according to Mr. Brown's testimony of January 7, 1918, before the House Appropriations Committee, whose services were enlisted to place the War Risk Bureau on a business basis and, in his words, "to work out the simplest and most effective method of doing every job." Here Mr. Brown had no rival officials to dispute his sway. Here were no time-honored customs to overturn. The War Risk Bureau was virgin soil. Expert Brown was in flush at the very beginning to install his efficiency system without let or hindrance and to swing into full play his long-treasured ideas on effective organization. The results speak for themselves. With complaints rising in a swelling tide, while some 14,000 employees, housed in 18 buildings, are standing in each other's way in helpless confusion, it must finally dawn on Mr. Brown that there is something sadly wrong with his efficiency system. Nor is here any evidence of "substantial savings." And yet, strange as it may seem, despite much trouble, little progress, and many rebuffs, Mr. Brown and his idea have kept growing in prominence. Just a minor department, then an important division, and now an independent bureau—this is a record of less than six years. Surely there must still be magic in the word "efficiency."

THE NATIONAL CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM LEAGUE.

Even with his latest unfortunate experience, Mr. Brown and the Bureau of Efficiency may still cherish ambitious dreams of expanding influence and power. In this tumultuous hour of reconstruction anything is possible, and recent developments indicate that in this particular instance big things may now be under way.

The National Civil Service Reform League is an organization opposed to the spoils system in politics and committed to ideas of efficiency in the Government service. It numbers among its members men prominent in public affairs. Its president is Mr. Richard H. Dana, of Boston, and late in November, 1918, Mr. Dana, as chairman of a league committee of five members, released a sweeping indictment against the present Civil Service Commission, charging it with general incompetency and calling for its reorganization. President Dana furthermore charges particularly that the Civil Service Commission is in collusion with the Post Office Department, and by submitting eligible lists to Congressmen have cooperated in "securing the partisan reconstruction of the so-called motor Rural Free Delivery Service." More revelations along the same line are promised by Mr. Dana in the early future.

A surprisingly intimate knowledge of the inside workings of both the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department is revealed in this attack by the league causing the initiated to be curious as to their source of information. It is known, however, that a bond of friendly intimacy exists between the officers of the league and Mr. Herbert D. Brown, and President Dana in committee hearings has on a number of occasions referred approvingly to Mr. Brown's opinions, stating in one instance that "the league had employed Mr. Brown years ago."

The peculiar aspect of this whole affair lies in the fact that while Mr. Dana, president of the league, goes gunning to promote the reorganization and run the present Civil Service Commission out of office it happens that at almost exactly the same time Mr. William A. Bird, editor of Good Government, the official publication of the Civil Service Reform League, offers a comprehensive plan to expand the powers of the Civil Service Commission and provide for its reorganization. And the strange part of the whole business is that, according to Mr. Bird's plan, Mr. Herbert D. Brown would naturally and logically float into the vacancy at the head of the reorganized Civil Service Commission, which President Dana leading a determined onslaught had created.

The Public is a widely read weekly publication of aggressive and progressive tendencies. In its issue of November 16, 1918, there appears a contribution from the pen of William A. Bird on the subject of civil-service reform. This article calls for a reorganization of the Government service along more efficient lines, and, what is more to the point, offers a platform showing how this reorganization should be effected. Here is how it is to be done:

Transformation of the Civil Service Commission into a genuine employment department by giving it complete jurisdiction over all appointments, promotions, and removals, except of officers appointed with senatorial confirmation.

Prescription of competitive examinations for the latter class of offices, except those of Cabinet rank or those having distinctly policy-determining functions, and the nomination to the Senate of the highest on the list.

Consolidation of the Efficiency Bureau with the Civil Service Commission, giving it the duty of keeping service records of all employees, on which all promotions, dismissals, etc., should be based.

Discontinuance of separate hiring and firing by all other agencies of the Government and of recruiting applicants for examinations, these functions to belong solely to the Civil Service Commission.

A careful perusal of this program of reorganization will show the unlimited authority it is proposed to vest in the Civil Service Commission. Promotions, removals, transfers, the right to hire and fire are, according to this plan, to be the future functions of the Civil Service Commission and fully a million employees are to come under its benign jurisdiction, no one escaping except the few of Cabinet rank. This is indeed an ambitious program. The Civil Service Commission would achieve a distinction at once that would make it the mecca of all office-seekers' hopes. But the important item in point is that the Bureau of Efficiency is to be joined to the Civil Service Commission, with greatly expanded powers over the Government employees. Then it must naturally follow when the present Civil Service Commission has been thrown out of office on President Dana's list of changes some one else must be selected to fill their places. And who would be more logically a candidate than the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency, Mr. Herbert D. Brown? And the fact that Mr. Brown might aspire for and even reach this prospective eminence would not be a whit more strange in the light of his past career than that he now holds his present important station. It is a matter well worth thinking about.

Did the situation warrant this entire subject could be continued at length. A careful inquiry tracing the ramifications of this bureau will, I am sure, reveal further evidence that will justify its entire discontinuance. I disclaim any animus or interest either in Mr. Brown or the Bureau of Efficiency other than what springs from a concern for the public welfare. Any error I have made in this indictment will be freely acknowledged when the facts presented in rebuttal prove my deductions incorrect or inaccurate statements to have been made. In the light of all information available, however, I am utterly unable to see where this Bureau of Efficiency fills any useful niche in governmental activities or contributes any beneficial service worth mentioning. I doubt that it has effected any considerable saving of the people's money. The cost of its operation has grown to be an imposing total and each year a large additional appropriation is demanded for its maintenance. The conviction grows upon me that the Bureau of Efficiency could be entirely wiped out without loss to the public service.

If, however, it is the wish of Congress to continue this bureau, then its affairs should be overhauled and a more efficient system of accounting and administration installed. Its expenditures should be confined within its appropriations. It should make its reports promptly to Congress when ordered to do so. It should give a detailed and specific account of its activities, clearly show the character of work it is doing, state explicitly the amount and nature of the savings it has effected, and compile its reports in such a manner that the ordinary legislator can read and understand. We want efficiency; it is a good thing. What we do not want, however, is any Government institution, guilty of gross negligence and inattention to public duty, attempt to conceal its impotence under some high-sounding title. Efficiency is as efficiency does. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I address myself to the question of a league of nations to enforce peace, and approach it with sincerity and humility, asking only unprejudiced and thoughtful colleagues to consider the views suggested, with the same spirit of charity which I am endeavoring to use in presenting them. I am told that there is a tribe in Africa, who, when meeting anything in life that is new to them, they immediately shoot at it; and that in the same neighborhood there is another tribe which, when meeting anything new they immediately fall down and worship it. Let us hope that we will rear a tribe in Congress that will meet this new question without either violence or fear, but rather meet it calmly and with what intelligence we can command, patiently solve the problem. The league of nations to enforce peace is of necessity, somewhat vague and indefinite, and most of the objections thus far raised seem to me to grow from a misconception of the plan suggested by the organization in this country, known as "The League to Enforce Peace," which apparently has met the practical approval of the President of the United States, and, as I think I shall show, with the substantial approval of the late ex-President Roosevelt. In order that it may be understood, I quote from propositions made by the league. The following is a brief exposition of the league's program, presented by ex-President Taft:

Briefly, it is proposed that a league of nations, including the United States, be created at the end of the present war. An invitation to join the league would probably be extended to all civilized and progressive nations. A general treaty would be signed, by the terms of which the member nations would mutually agree to submit to public hearing any and all disputes which might arise among them. Such an agreement would not apply to quarrels of a purely national character and would not, therefore, interfere with insurrections or prevent revolutions. To carry out the program it would be necessary to set up two international tribunals—a judicial court, for the purpose of hearing those questions that can be determined by the accepted and established rules of international law and equity, and a council of conciliation, for the purpose of composing by compromise all other questions that come up which, unless settled, would be likely to lead to war. A peaceful way would thus be provided to change unjust conditions however arising. The court, after preliminary inquiry, would determine before which tribunal a given case would go. In the event of any member nation, without first submitting its quarrel to public review and report, all the other nations who are members of the league would immediately join in bringing to bear both diplomatic and economic pressure to stop the would-be aggressor. If after this joint protest it persisted with overt acts of hostility and actually commenced war, then the other member nations, with their combined military and naval forces, would come to the defense of the one attacked. It is confidently expected that the acceptance and operation of the program would result in the gradual reduction of armaments, if a specific agreement to reduce armaments were not made one of the essential terms of the treaty creating the league of nations.

I read now from an article by Theodore Roosevelt:

Fortunately, Mr. Taft has set forth the proposal for such a league under existing conditions with such wisdom in refusing to let adherence to the principle be clouded by insistence upon improper or unimportant methods of enforcement that we can speak of the league as a practical matter. I think that most of our people are in favor of the establishment of the principle of such a league under common-sense conditions which will not attempt too much and thereby expose the movement to the absolute certainty of ridicule and failure. There must be an honest effort to eliminate some of the causes that may produce future wars and to minimize the area of such wars.

SUPPLEMENT TO NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. Taft explicitly admits and insists that the league is to be a supplement to and in no sense a substitute for the duty of our Nation to prepare its own strength for its own defense. He also explicitly provides that among the various peoples who would not be admitted to the league on an equality with the others there shall be different spheres of interests assumed by the different powers who have entered into the league.

For example, the affairs of either Asia, the Balkan Peninsula, and of north Africa are of prime concern to the powers of Europe, and the United States should be under no covenant to go to war about matters in which its people have no concern and probably no intelligent interest.

MONROE DOCTRINE MUST STAND.

On the other hand, the Monroe doctrine—at least for all America between the Equator and the southern boundary of the United States—is a vital point of American policy and must in no shape or way be interfered with. We do not interfere with existing conditions, but aside from these no European or Asiatic power is to have any say so in the future of Mexico, Central America, and the lands whose coasts are washed by the Caribbean Sea.

The Panama Canal must not be internationalized. It is our canal. We built it, we fortified it, and we will protect it, and we will not permit our enemies to use it in war. In time of peace all nations shall use it alike, but in time of war our interest at once becomes dominant.

RESERVES INTERNAL QUESTIONS.

Most wisely, Mr. Taft's plan reserves for each nation certain matters of such vital national interest that they can not be put before any international tribunal. This country must settle its own tariff and industrial policies and the question of admitting immigrants to work or to citizenship and all similar matters, the exercise of which was claimed as a right when in 1776 we became an independent Nation. We will not surrender our independence to a league of nations any more than to a single nation.

Moreover, no international court must be intrusted with the decision of what is and what is not justifiable. In the articles of agreement the nonjustifiable matters should be as sharply defined as possible, and until some better plan can be devised the nation itself must reserve to itself the right as each case arises to say what these matters are.

And a few excerpts from the addresses of President Wilson:

I pray God that if this contest have no other result, it will at least have the result of creating an international tribune and producing some sort of joint guaranty of peace on the part of the great nations of the world. * * * Now, let us suppose that we have formed a family of nations and that family of nations says: "The world is not going to have any more wars of this sort without at least first going through certain processes to show whether there is anything in its case or not." If you say "We shall not have any war," you have got to have the force to make the "shall" bite. And the rest of the world, if America takes part in this thing, will have the right to expect from her that she contribute her element of force to the general understanding. Surely that is not a militaristic ideal. That is a very practical ideal."

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks, because I did not think it necessary to read to my colleagues all of these excerpts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MASON. If there is any desire on the part of anyone to know the President's views in a general way, I would recommend them to read his address delivered in Washington, D. C., May 27, 1916; also his Memorial Day address, May 30, the same year; and of June 13, 1916; June 17, 1916; September 2, 1916; October 6, 18, and 25, 1916; November 4, 1916; his address to the Senate, January 22, 1917; and his war message to Congress, April 2, 1917. I also desire to call your attention to the remarks of Lloyd George on January 11, 1917, when he says: "The best security for peace will be that nations will band themselves together to punish the peace breaker." The former prime minister of Great Britain, Hon. Herbert Asquith, indorses our President's views in the following:

The President held out to his hearers the prospect of an era when the civilization of mankind, banded together for the purpose, will make it their joint and several duty to repress by their united authority and, if need be, by their combined naval and military forces, any wanton or aggressive invasion of the peace of the world. It is a fine ideal, which must arouse all our sympathies.

Mr. Chairman, the league of nations and all others speaking of the cases to be heard use the word "justiceable," and it may not be out of place to explain briefly its meaning, for I believe that it has been greatly misconceived by distinguished statesmen of our own country, and when you once get at the root of the word and its proper use it will seem as though our distinguished friends in the Senate fight a man of straw and are afraid of their own shadows. I say this with great respect, for, as a matter of fact, I discuss this question with humility, because such distinguished Senators have seemed to comment adversely upon the whole proposition. One, a Senator from Massachusetts, who has earned his leadership in American diplomacy, another distinguished Senator who has honored the office of Secretary of State, another Senator from the State of Missouri who has attracted the attention of Americans by his courage and ability. The questions they ask are entirely pertinent, but clearly indicate their opposition to the plan. First, Mr. Speaker, it is proposed to submit only "justiceable" questions. Those who write dictionaries say that the word is obsolete. It is used by our Supreme Court in a way that clearly indicates that it applies not only to the cause but to the authority or jurisdiction of the court. Kinny's Law Dictionary shows "justiceable" in old English law means "amenable; summonable." "Summons" at law means "called by authority to appear at the place named." So that a cause to be justiceable in the court means not only that it involves the question of justice between parties, but it means that the court considering it has jurisdiction and with power to compel attendance. To illustrate, the Supreme Court of the United States in several cases where they use the word show that it means something more than the cause itself. No cause can be submitted to this international court or league that is not submitted by the Senate of the United States, and when Senators ask questions which even suggest the possibility of submitting fixed American principles to that court or submitting questions which would involve the constitutional rights of the citizen he expresses a fear as to his own future conduct, which, it is hoped, in the fair and open discussion of this case they will overcome. To illustrate, if some foreign country, being aggrieved at the conduct of our citizens, should demand that those citizens be tried at this international court, an American Senate could be relied upon not to make a treaty which would deprive a citizen of his right of trial by jury, and even if the President and the Senate should so far forget their duty as to attempt to compel an American citizen to be tried without a jury the Supreme Court of the United States will grant a writ of habeas corpus just as cheerfully as they now set aside the laws now passed by Congress which they find to be in conflict with the Constitution.

Then the word "justiciable," as it must be used now, carries with it a jurisdictional question, and clearly no question which involves the honor of this Nation or the fixed constitutional rights of our citizens would be "justiciable" in an international court, and could not be made so by treaty which violates the Constitution of the United States. Any such league or court could not, under the present propositions, hear without the consent of the parties in interest, because the United States, regarded as one State, under international law has not surrendered or agreed to any such power. The difference can be illustrated by the opinion of Chief Justice Fuller, Louisiana v. Mississippi (202 U. S. Supreme Court, p. 33). Mr. Justice Fuller used this language:

"The demurrer was overruled because the court was of opinion that the bill presented a prima facie case of justiciable controversy between Louisiana and Mississippi, and such a controversy as to fully sustain our jurisdiction.

By the Constitution of the United States, all of the States submitted certain questions of controversy between themselves to the Supreme Court, and gave to that court exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. Justice Bradley, in the case of Hands v. Louisiana (134 U. S. Supreme Court, p. 1), stated that the Constitution of the United States made some causes justiciable "which were not known as such at the common law." And in the case of Missouri v. The Illinois Sanitary Districts of Chicago the court took jurisdiction because of the drainage in the sanitary districts affecting the waters in Missouri, and though no boundary lines, or anything which had been theretofore considered as a controversy between States was involved, yet the court held that it was justiciable in the Supreme Court of the United States, and the reasons given are most progressive, holding, in substance, that as Missouri could not make war against Illinois there must be some remedy and that the cause presented was justiciable, again showing that "justiciable" in its modern application involved jurisdictional questions.

The United States, being a sovereign State and having power to make war, can not be forced into this court except by agreement, and that agreement would be the thing would give jurisdiction and that agreement will not only lay down the questions to be settled but might, and probably would, make certain rules which would become part of the law of the case submitted.

As a matter of fact, Webster says that the word "justiciable" is obsolete, but the word is not obsolete, although the old definition is, in my opinion, out of use. When the Supreme Court of the United States uses the word "justiciable," it means that there is a case which can be heard in that court either by agreement of the parties or by reason of the Constitution of the United States—in other words, there is a case of which the Supreme Court has jurisdiction with power to summon the offending party into court—which gave that court jurisdiction and power. In my humble opinion a better definition of the word "justiciable," or at least a definition which explains its true meaning when considering this tribunal which may be established by a league of nations, is to add to the definition a cause that may be heard and determined in a court of justice where the court has jurisdiction with power to summons and where the agreement submitting the question becomes a part of the law governing the cause submitted. With this definition in view, every nation can guard its own interest in the submission of its cause, and looking, as it is our duty to do, to the interests of the United States, no cause could ever be made "justiciable" which endangered our integrity as a Nation or put in jeopardy the inalienable rights of our citizens.

Suppose the Senate should submit a treaty which allowed that court or league to determine how much tax we should pay in support of a given church. That would not be "justiciable" nor could the Senate make it so. There is not a suggestion in the so-called Taft plan, or any plan in the President's speeches, that would allow that court to interfere with the domestic policy of any nation. The opposite is suggested by everyone. So we can put aside our timidity on that score.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question at that point, before leaving the question of justiciable cases? I desire to ask him as to what number of cases that would remove if you applied it to justiciable cases only. Would it be important in number?

Mr. MASON. It means simply this, in my opinion, that every case would have to be submitted separately at first; and that in submitting a case the stipulations or treaty submitting it would limit the questions to be tried and it would become a part of the law governing the case.

Mr. TILSON. It would simply be submitting it that makes it justiciable?

Mr. MASON. Yes; otherwise it could not be until you submit it, because it has no natural jurisdiction. The Supreme Court has jurisdiction in the controversies between the States, because the States have no power to declare war, having delegated that power to the United States of America, and the Supreme Court of the United States got exclusive jurisdiction over all controversies between the States by the Constitution.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are asked of what use can such a court be unless it has power to enforce its own jurisdiction as well as power to enforce its decrees? Anyone familiar with arbitration in our domestic affairs will remember that we met that same question in different States when we established boards of arbitration that were not compulsory, and all know what a great stride that was toward the protection of the peace of our community. We said to the capitalist and to the labor organization, "There is the board of arbitration"; and the one who refused to step into that tribunal immediately lost public sentiment and lost his cause. We can not expect in this starting in to make new international law to accomplish all at the beginning, but the moment that the tribunal is established and war is threatened between any nations, great or small, the nation that refuses to submit to an impartial court loses the respect and the confidence of the nations of the world, the respect and the confidence of its own people, and by its very refusal admits that its demands are not based on justice.

Again I say to the timid: Let not your heart be troubled. The Senate will never by general or special treaty submit Americanism to any court, and they can not do it if they try, for which thank God and the Constitution of the United States.

My next proposition is that there is a treaty, under law and good conscience, existing between all the nations at war which agrees to the league of nations to enforce peace and for self-determination of the little peoples of the world. When, you may ask, did the powers agree to that treaty? My answer is, the day that President Wilson's propositions were approved by our allies and accepted by the central powers. By the law of right, not might, all other treaties, private and public, between any or all of the parties were merged into that treaty.

I know the terms of secret treaties between our associates made before we entered the war provided, in the case of success of their arms, that territory should be taken and government be without the consent of the governed. I know that the Senate of the United States did not in form advise and consent to that agreement, made by us and accepted by our allies. I know that the several sovereigns did not in form authorize it to be signed and sealed by their several ministers. But I also know the two propositions for which I contend—self-determination and permanent peace—were reduced to writing by our President, approved by our associates, accepted in writing by our enemies, approved by 100,000,000 American people, and sealed by the blood of our sons. And that signing and sealing ought in honor to bind any honorable man or nation.

Mr. Chairman, our country is facing the greatest problem that has ever confronted it. In all of written history no such situation or anything approaching it has presented itself. We will be able, as a Nation, to meet these great questions if we will put aside partisan jealousy and political interests and, forgetting all past differences, approach these questions in a spirit of unselfishness.

The conflict just closed will be known in history as "The War," possibly "The World War" or "The Great War"; and while we felicitate ourselves on its result we must give credit where credit is due—not to statesmen, not to the great business men who have made sacrifices, not to the great officers who have rendered such splendid service, but to the sturdy American boy who on the western front went fearlessly into the face of the enemy and turned the tide of war on that spring morning in 1918. And the first step in the discharge of the duty that lies before us is to protect those boys and those who depend upon them against further sacrifices. None of our higher aspirations for an ideal future can come about if we can neglect "the least of these" who tendered their all in their country's service.

Mr. Chairman, it is the duty of the President to negotiate treaties for acceptance or rejection by the Senate of the United States. According to both Webster and Clay, the House of Representatives must be interested in those treaties, as that body must furnish the means—the legislation and money—to carry out any treaty which the President and the Senate may make. And, then, back of us are the people themselves, who make and unmake Presidents and Congresses; and, in the last analysis, public opinion must approve any treaty to make it valuable to the world.

The American people, then, having to pass final judgment upon the conduct of the President and the Congress—the American people being the court of last resort—it follows that that court should be informed as to all the facts, and this can be made possible only by open and free discussion in the peace parley now in progress. It would be worse than folly to ask an intelligent verdict from a jury when the facts had all been excluded from that jury. No final verdict that will make for civilization can be had if the American Congress and the American people are to be gagged, bound, and tongue-tied while considering these great questions. There must be absolutely no secret trading or conniving. Let those who come to the peace table be prepared to speak openly, and, if they are so compelled to do, there will be less of selfishness and none of us will make demands that do not appeal to the human sense of justice. And in the greatest of all the questions, the right of self-determination of the little peoples of the world, all should be open and free, so that there may be no controversy in the future as to what facts were permitted to be known by the people and what facts were concealed from the people.

It is said by some that the treaty of peace will be somewhat hampered by secret treaties of the past; if so, then the keeping of the secret treaties will be kept rather in the "breach than in the performance." I have shown it would not be a breach of treaty since the terms have been agreed to by all nations. The trouble all along has been that international law has not kept pace with civil law, for under international law there is written into every treaty by the law itself "This treaty is binding only so long as it is found to be to the interest of the parties hereto." We have complained of the breach of treaties; the complaint lies deeper—the complaint is against the unethical rule of international law which permits the cancellation of treaties whenever either party says they are against the interests of that party. We are standing facing the greatest opportunity to amend international law that has ever been presented to us, and if we fail to rise in this emergency the great sacrifices of the past few years will have been in vain.

Every citizen has a right to think and speak. I suggest as a part, at first, the simple statement:

We hereby form a league of nations to secure permanent peace, to which all nations are invited.

We agree to refrain from making with any nation any secret treaty or agreement.

We agree that in case of any disagreement between the parties hereto or between any of the parties hereto and any other nation—provided such disagreement does not involve the sovereignty of any nation—to submit such disagreement to such league of nations for conciliation before committing any act of war upon any nation.

We are in a position now to stop the wicked demands of "military necessity" and the plea of "national safety," given as a reason for war. We are in a position now to prevent international dueling, called war, as we have stopped the dueling of individuals in the United States.

It is feared by some of the best of our students of statecraft that we might, in entering such a league, violate the Constitution of the United States. That objection, however, answers itself when we consider that whatever we do in maintaining the peace of the world will be done by the treaty-making power which becomes the law of our land.

Those treaties need come only to the establishment of "neutral" zones, territories, or States. It was not unconstitutional for the United States to agree that Panama should be neutral territory; it was not unconstitutional when, in the keeping of that treaty, the President of the United States forbade and prevented fighting and the killing of people there; in other words, he prevented war.

Of course, that was in the interest of trade and commerce, another name for a dollar; and, now, standing in the shadow of our great sacrifice, sorrowing in the loss of our children and suffering with the broken-hearted wives and mothers, have we not enough of genius and the spirit of Christ with us to demand in the field of diplomacy as much consideration for human hearts and lives as we have heretofore given in the interest of trade and commerce?

Some say that in our action in Panama we did violence to our little neighbor, the United States of Colombia. Then, if so, let this great international court consider that very question. Our sister Republic has made a claim against us; our President has recommended the payment of a large sum of money. He makes this recommendation in good conscience, yet I never could, as an American or as a judge sitting in the case, with my knowledge of the facts, vote for one cent to our sister Republic. But I know the dangers of an interested judge or a prejudiced jury, and while I feel that we do not owe them one penny I would be willing to leave the matter to a disinterested court, because the case could be made by treaty to come within the word "justiciable." It is a claim sounding in dollars and cents, and if a disinterested court should decide that the United States owes the Republic $10,000,000 or $20,000,000, as one citizen I would rather pay it than to face the world with the proposition that we refused to pay our honorable obligations to the little peoples of the world wherever they may be located and refused to enter a court of justice. If, by any course of reason, an unprejudiced court was to decide against America, I would rather suffer what seems to be a financial wrong than to take the life of our neighbor or sacrifice an American boy.

Suppose a treaty was made that we would make war on certain conditions. This could not relieve Congress from its power to declare war or not as the conditions require.

We are told that it would destroy the Monroe doctrine. Mr. Chairman, the Monroe doctrine is as full of strange constructions and debatable propositions as the plan of salvation in religion and as surrounds the "freedom of the seas" in the field of diplomacy.

I think that about the middle of the last century Lord Palmerston announced the doctrine that where citizens invested their money it was the duty of the Government to collect it, and if a few freebooters in one country could, by bribery or corruption of the officials of a little nation, put the burden of taxes upon that nation, then the army and navy could be used to collect, regardless of the equity. We have seen enterprising, unsavory gentlemen, even from our own dear country, going into South America and by corrupting the ruling powers they have been able to get millions of bonds guaranteed by the Government where the money invested was from one-tenth to one-third of the bond.

It can be said to the credit of President Roosevelt that he enlarged along the lines of justice the rules of the Monroe doctrine. We have gradually stretched the Monroe doctrine around Cape Horn and taken in all of the islands of the sea, except where some other unselfish nations, including monarchies and republics, have extended their Monroe doctrines and got there ahead of us. The whole Monroe doctrine, as stated by President Monroe, is but the placing in words of what was known in international law as the "zone of influence." That zone of influence law was based on geographic nearness; but history shows that it was a rule that did not work. On the contrary, the doctrine of nearness gave way to the doctrine of diligence and expansion. The Monroe doctrine can be improved under the league of nations as proposed by Mr. Taft and his colaborers, and is not an impossible or an iridescent dream to say that that league, once established, the duties of the United States of America would be much lightened, for back of the Stars and Stripes would be the colors of every civilized nation in the world, prohibiting the invasion of one country by another and protecting the sovereignty of the smallest peoples on the earth.

Mr. Chairman, again we are told there are so many intricate questions. I know it, Mr. Chairman. When one enters the field with open mind he is staggered to see how little he knows of the intricate problems that confront us. It is most distressing to hear inexperienced men who solve these great human problems in the twinkling of an eye.

To-day, in the ancient birthplace of Christianity, wrested from "the unspeakable Turk," grave questions are arising. The people of the United States judge the Jewish race by our citizens here, and we, having seen their advancement in art, their success in commerce, and their loyalty to American ideals, feel that they can be trusted to manage their own inheritance. Our noble ally, France, makes a suggestion as to the reconstruction of that country, while our equally splendid ally, the English Jew begins to be fearful, I can judge by their writings, that the reorganization of that government may be left still subject to political intrigue and commercial exploit.

The paper of to-day shows that our noble and brave ally, the Italian, who has fought side by side with our boys and given unstintingly of lives and treasury, is met by a proposition of those who seek to organize the new Serbian Nation, and a demand is made that the Italians evacuate Trentino and Istria. A few months' study of the Russian situation will leave you less informed than when you first began. We do know that American lives are being sacrificed in Russia to support one political party without the consent of Congress, which is alone the war-making power of the United States. We do know and feel sure that Poland, so long oppressed, is to rise again and take her place among the nations of the earth, and nowhere in the world is the news received with such joy as here in the United States, where we native Americans have learned to know that race to be able and worthy of self-government. We in Chicago know the Bohemian and the Lithuanian deserve that we keep our word. That is all they ask.

But it has its complications which must be met and solved in a spirit of righteousness, and unless we begin now, in this world parley, it would seem as though the sacrifice of blood and tears has been in vain. The "little peoples" of the world are promised consideration regardless of the question of whether they are nations or simply little peoples. We are told that we are not entering the realm even of discussing the relations of Great Britain and Ireland. Why? The British, the Scottish, and the Irish fought side by side with our boys; there is not a field where English valor was so nobly shown that is not stained by Irish blood. Are some questions too sacred to speak of? We have, or claim to have, some sovereignty in the Philippine Islands. They stood ready to serve; they are asking independence. If they should knock for admission and I was the doorkeeper, I would open the door and bid them thrice welcome as one of the "little peoples" of the world whose rights are to be considered. I know many of our friends will say that is an American question, but I say, "No; not after the sacrifice we have made for the little peoples of the world."

They say our flag is over the Philippine Islands, and that the British flag is over Ireland; and I say that the American flag has never been over the Philippines with the consent of the little people, and the flag of our ally, Great Britain, was put over, and has been kept over, Ireland by force and without the consent of the men, women, and children beneath that flag.

Mr. Chairman, I say this with no unkind feeling in my heart toward our ally, Great Britain, and certainly with no desire to cast reflections upon our splendid ally or upon our native land; but we have yet to learn, again and again, the old lesson that territory and people governed by force and against their will is wrong—eternally wrong—and that it means happiness neither to the Government nor to the governed.

It is a question of international honor; it is a question of whether the broad propositions made by the President of the United States, which were accepted by the American people, by our allies, and finally by Germany, means one thing for our friends and another for our enemies. If the President is right, and I believe he is, then the United States can not afford to demand independence for the little peoples of the world while we keep the American flag over the Philippine Islands and the British flag over Ireland. Mr. Chairman, the great hindrance to civilization has been the ungodly desire of one man to govern another man without his consent; the ungodly desire of one people to govern another people without their consent. [Applause.] To make other people happy our way. George III said from the throne he wanted us Americans to have the blessings of happiness that come from English liberty. Be happy our way. We got the large ego and said the same thing to the Filipino. [Applause.] They now ask independence. I am for it. How can we talk about self-determination for others and refuse it to the Filipino? Hear their prayer.

The legislature in a joint session held in the marble hall of the Ayuntamiento has adopted the following joint resolution:

"Whereas the chief executive has just informed the legislature that it may take official cognizance of the termination of hostilities in Europe under the terms of the armistice laid down by the United States and her associated Governments; and

"Whereas said terms of the armistice are such as to insure the advent of peace: Be it therefore

"Resolved, That a message of most heartfelt congratulations be sent to the President of the United States for the brilliant success obtained by the United States in the terrible war just ended, together with the expressions of the confident expectation of the Filipino people that this victory of power shall be converted into the victory of right through the glorious realization of the great ideals of humanity, justice, and liberty and self-government enunciated and reiterated by President Wilson.

"Be it further resolved, That it be recorded, as it is hereby recorded, the gratitude of the Filipino people to the United States for the part they were allowed to take in the most far-reaching enterprise ever undertaken by democracy, the first part of which, fought in the field of arms, has successfully ended.

"Be it finally resolved, That the Filipino people, which has unqualifiedly sided with the United States when the war was thrust upon her, hereby renew their adherence to the noble purposes sought in this war, and they place themselves again, as heretofore, at the pleasure of the American people, ready to contribute their modest but cordial and determined service in the forthcoming task of reconstruction and peace. The Filipino people believe that Providence, in choosing the American people as the leader in this stupendous and immortal enterprise, has ordained in its high designs that through the complete development and application to all peoples of the principles which have given birth to the United States the fruit of victory gained at the cost of untold sacrifice shall not have come to naught; that the world be made safe for democracy; that the rights and liberties of the small nations be forever secured and guaranteed; that the peoples desiring to be free be liberated and allowed to establish, without fear or hindrance, a government of their own choosing, and change it at will when so demanded by their best interests; that the weak be not at the mercy of the strong, and that the spirit of selfishness and domination be destroyed and established in its place amongst all free men of the world a new kingdom of constructive and equalitarian justice based upon foundations that will make it universal, secure, and permanent, and when all these things shall have been confirmed that the war, which has happily ended, has been fought in the interest of free humanity and the everlasting peace of the world."

MANILA, November 19, 1918.

SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington.

Referring to telegram from your office of the 15th instant, which I referred confidentially to the presidents of both houses of the legislature, I beg to transmit at their request the following:

"The main purpose of the Philippine mission was to secure from the United States the final adjustment of matters affecting our national independence. This mission could have been sent some time ago, but the war in which America was engaged and the noble issues to which we have given our most unqualified indorsement did not permit us to take such a step. The hostilities having now ended with the victory of American arms and ideals, our duty called upon us to act, hence the joint resolution unanimously passed by the Philippine Legislature providing that a special mission be sent to the United States. The Filipino people, which demand of its representatives these final steps, is earnestly desirous to establish its own independent government, not alone as the only fitting culmination of its efforts on behalf of its ideals of liberty and democracy but also as a practical corollary of the principles of self-government enunciated and reiterated by the President of the United States in his war messages. The mission is now organized and has decided to sail on the Manoa, due in San Francisco about the 17th of next month. This trip is publicly known and it has received the cordial approval of the whole country. In view, however, of the suggestions of the War Department transmitted to us by the Governor General four days ago, and having, as we have, absolute faith in the President, we are ready to defer to his wishes by postponing for the time being the trip of the mission. We are mindful of the grave responsibility we are assuming before the Filipino people in delaying the execution of a demand in which are involved its most vital interests, but we take this step after full deliberation, without misgivings, because of our firm conviction that the President already has a plan that will satisfy the national aspirations of the Filipino people, which we have on repeated occasions presented to the Government of the United States, and that the execution of such plan in so far as the Government of the United States is concerned is assured, during the present administration. In view of these facts and so that we may submit the point of view of the Filipino people, would the President allow us to hope that he will find some opportunity to confer and deliberate with the Filipino mission as to details as soon as it may be compatible with the most pressing war matters of the Government of the United States? As the authorized spokesmen of our people, we would not properly express its feelings if we did not take advantage of this opportunity to say that the Filipino people is profoundly grateful to the United States for her encouraging promises of independence, and for the assurances now reiterated, all confirming our faith that the interests of the Filipino people are safe in the hands of President Wilson."

In transmitting the foregoing message I have received another evidence of the wisdom of the Filipino leaders and of their faith in the President. I invite the President's attention, however, to the effect of his war addresses upon the Filipino people. They are encouraged by them to expect that independence would follow as a matter of course the victory of America. All agitation for independence has been avoided here during the war on account of the anxiety of the Filipinos to repress any expression of opinion which might be constructed as a lack of appreciation and loyalty to us at a time when their utmost support and cooperation was expected and enthusiastically given. It is certain that the Filipino people believed that the main issue of the war was the right to self-determination to every people, once disappointed, could present a serious military problem to the United States, but I respectfully submit that our position would be difficult and the situation of the representative of our country in the Philippines most embarrassing if the consideration of Philippine independence is now indefinitely postponed. The people here have become restless * * * and are really anxious to secure early action, settling definitely their future from a sympathetic and responsive Congress. Indecisive treatment of the question would be, in my opinion, an unfortunate culmination of our policy, which has made the people of the islands so content and so prosperous during recent years. Will the President authorize me, at his convenience, to make some statement of policy here which will meet this situation?

HARRISON.

See our situation in Cuba. For the first time in the history of the world we made sacrifices without demanding territory or power. We promised, when we declared war against Spain, that we would not take territory. Notwithstanding that promise, the cry went up that wherever the American flag went up, it went to stay. "Keep Cuba"; and men and newspapers, sounding like a large parrot lined with a graphophone, repeated it from ocean to ocean: "Don't haul down the American flag; it's up to stay!" And then they branded as traitors and pro-Spanish every American gentleman who demanded that our country should keep its promise.

Mr. Chairman, I was in Cuba on the day our flag came down and the little republican flag of the single star took its place. Our flag, sir, is the most beautiful emblem in the world, but it never looked so beautiful to me as it did that day coming down, because it was keeping the promise of a Christian Nation. [Applause.]

If I could speak to the conscience of the English Government and the English people I would beg them to know how much stronger to-day the American Government is in Cuba than the British Government is in Ireland. [Applause.] There is not a man, woman, or child in Cuba who does not love the American flag, and the moment we declared war against Germany the little brother sprang to our side with all he had to give in men, money, and ships. Why? Because we kept faith; because we stood by the right of the little peoples of the world to govern themselves. We made room in the Cuban sky for the Cuban flag; and when our brave and splendid mother country, Great Britain, makes room in the Irish sky for an Irish flag she will have a stronger ally in trade and commerce, peace or war, than she can ever have while the Irish citizen is a subject of Great Britain by force.

Mr. Chairman, in discussing the treatment to be given to Ireland, I agree with the proposition that we must stand with our allies in this now critical movement for the future peace of the world, and any American who knows the sacrifices of the English people, the loss in blood and treasury which they have sustained; any American who knows the willing sacrifice made by the English people and the bravery of her soldiers would not, for a moment, do anything to belittle the greatness of the English people. But, Mr. Speaker, that does not mean that the American Government and the American people shall be silent, nor does it mean that any American citizen, however weak and unimportant, shall be denied the right of speaking fearlessly, though with affectionate regard for our allies, upon every question that involves American honor and the future of our country. For that reason we can not stop to discuss the differences which have existed for centuries between the Irish people and the English Government. It is not necessary to recall the sorrows of Ireland any more than it is necessary for us to go back foolishly and talk about our differences in war more than 100 years ago. But, Mr. Speaker, one of the things which holds the French and the American people, which made our people so willing to sacrifice in this war, was the help rendered to America in the War of the Revolution by the French people; and it will not be improper in this connection to consider that at the same time France was helping us to win our independence Ireland was doing the same thing. While our great Benjamin Franklin was preparing for the independence of our country, he visited Ireland as early as 1771. He went there to convince the Irish that their interests were the same as American interests; and Franklin says that he found the Irish people "disposed to be friends of America, in which I endeavored to confirm them with the expectation that our growing weight might in turn be thrown into one scale, and by joining our interests with theirs a more equitable treatment from this nation (England) might be obtained for themselves as well as for us."

It needs no great student of diplomacy to know that Franklin knew, and both England and Ireland knew, that he was, if necessary, willing to stir up trouble between Ireland and Great Britain if in so doing he could help America.

The first General Congress, which met in Philadelphia in 1774, appointed a committee to draft an address to the people of Ireland. That address was read on July 28, 1775, and says, among other things:

> You have ever been friendly to the rights of mankind, and we acknowledge with pleasure and gratitude that your nation has produced patriots who have nobly distinguished themselves in the cause of humanity and of America.

The great Pitt, in his defense of America in the English Parliament, declared that "Ireland was with America to a man"; and when the Earl of Effingham declared that we Americans were fellow subjects and that he would not draw his sword against our lives and liberties he was given by the people in Ireland an address of honor for his friendship for America.

Money was raised in Ireland by popular subscription to assist the American cause in the Revolutionary War. True it is that many Irishmen were in the war against us, but they were there as subjects of the nation at that time at war with us, and the thousands of Irish citizens who fought for our independence took the double chance of being killed in war and also of being tried for treason in case we failed. I speak of this in no spirit of resentment, but simply to correct the impression so prevalent among our people that the Irish people as a nation, or as a people, if you please, did not fight with us or help us in our own struggle for independence.

Mr. Chairman, the propositions made by our President were accepted in terms by our allies and with not a single protest except a suggestion as to some limitation of the meaning of "freedom of the seas." Therefore, in stating the propositions, so far as the Irish people are concerned, in quoting the demands of President Wilson, I am quoting what has been accepted by our allies. I call attention to the language of the President who, in making his demands, used the language of peoples and did not limit it to governments, so that for the purposes of this discussion it may be conceded that Ireland is not a nation; but no one will deny that the Irish are a people.

In the speech of September 27, 1918, the President names as the first of the five great issues of the war, "Shall the military power of any nation or group of nations be suffered to determine the fortunes of peoples over whom they have no right to rule except the right of force?" The third issue is, "Shall peoples be ruled and dominated, even in their own internal affairs, by arbitrary and irresponsible force or by their own will and choice?" And the President states that these "are the issues, and they must be settled definitely and once for all."

In the same speech he says "the satisfaction of the several peoples whose fortunes are dealt with" must be reached. The reading of this speech shows that that was addressed to all of our allies.

We turn to the 14 points made by the President on the 8th of January, 1918. In the tenth point he says: "The peoples of Austria-Hungary should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development." In the twelfth point, while it provides that "the Turkish portions of the present Ottoman Empire should be assured a secure sovereignty, the other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule should be assured an undoubted security of life and an absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development."

In the thirteenth point the language is even more explicit:

> An independent Polish state should be erected which should include the territories inhabited by indisputably Polish population. * * *

At the close of this address, he demands justice to all peoples and nationalities.

In the speech of the President of February 11, 1918, in replying to Von Hertling, he says:

> This war had its roots in the disregard of the rights of small nations and of nationalities which lacked the union and the force to make good their claim to determine their own allegiances and their own forms of political life. Covenants must now be entered into which will render such things impossible for the future; and those covenants must be backed by the united force of all the nations that love justice and are willing to maintain it at any cost.

I quote three of the four cardinal principles again laid down by the President to Congress on the 11th of February, 1918:

> II. That peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty, as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game, even the great game, now forever discredited, of the balance of power; but that—
>
> III. Every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned and not as a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims among rival states; and—
> IV. That all well-defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new or perpetually old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe and, consequently, of the world.

I quote now from the President's great address at Mount Vernon, in which he restates his four points, and I insert in full his second point:

> II. The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon the basis of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own exterior influence or mastery.

To-day there is no doubt that those who sit at the peace table will hear and consider the just claims of all the little peoples of the earth except Ireland. Mr. Chairman, we are told that this is purely an English question, and some say purely an Irish question. Mr. Chairman, I say it is neither.

We are told that self-determination and lasting peace are dreams. Dreams are thoughts.

There are good and bad dreams, practical dreams and idle dreams.

Less than 20 years ago a small number of men in a chamber near us said we should have Government savings banks. "Dreams," said our bankers. That we should have parcels post. "Dreams," cried the transportation companies. That we should have an income tax. "Dreams," said the rich man. That we should elect Members of that body by the people. "Dreams," said the political boss. That we should some time permit the majority to run that body. "Dreams," said the lovers of legislative power. Yet all these dreams have come true, and many more have come and will come. Every step in art, mechanics, or morals that has made for civilization has met with opposition, either by selfishness or pessimistic incredulity, sometimes both. While the dreamer of bad dreams has failed and been forgotten, the dreamer of good dreams may be forgotten, but his dreams come true.

The German Emperor dreamed of a world conquest, of self. A poor boy from Illinois, Abe Lincoln, on his flat-boat trip to New Orleans saw them selling human beings to the highest bidder, and he dreamed a dream. Which one of these dreams has come true?

To say that good dreams come true is only another way of saying that right and not might shall prevail. We poor optimists who dream of a league to enforce peace are scoffed and called bad names by some of the ablest statesmen; yet I tell you the law is fixed as eternal as the law of gravitation, that our dream of peace is born of unselfishness; it is brought to us by the better angels of our nature, and as sure as God is marching on it shall come true.

Ever since the shepherds on the hillside heard the angels' song of "Peace on earth; good will to men," men have doubted, but that promise has persisted.

In the midst of the roar of cannon and the whine of the shell the "still small voice" has been heard, and now, with uncovered heads and open hearts, in the presence of our heroic dead, shall we not dedicate ourselves to that for which the Master died and for which our boys have rendered the full measure of service?

I pray that the God of battle, that has given victory to our colors in every war, may be with us still in our struggle for an honorable and lasting peace.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. If it does not come out of that 10 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. I should like to know just how far the gentleman would carry the principle of self-determination. For instance, in the Philippines or in Ireland, as the gentleman has referred to these two cases, to how large a group would he apply the principle?

Mr. MASON. I would let the people there settle for themselves, as your dad and mine did in 1776. I asked Katherine Hughes, a well-known writer and a reliable representative of Irish nationality, as to the Ulster question, and this is her answer:

Ulster is an integral part of the ancient nation and territory of Ireland. It is a popular and a mistaken opinion in this country that all the Protestants of Ulster are opposed to the government of Ireland by the Irish. Ulster men qualified to judge claim that one-fifth of the Protestants of Ulster are nationalist Irish. Some of the most ardent Sinn Fein leaders to-day, like Blythe and Figgis and Hobson, are Protestants.

In all Ulster there is only a Protestant majority of 200,000. In Belfast city alone the entire Protestant majority of Ulster lives. In 5 of the 9 counties of Ulster the majority of the people are Catholic, viz, 81, 56, 74, 55, and 78 per cent of the population. In the 4 remaining counties the Protestant majority is 54, 54, 79, and 69 per cent. Ulster is not the richest Province of Ireland. Leinster is the richest and pays the largest share of taxes.

As Lindsay Crawford, an Ulster Protestant and founder of the Independent Orangemen, stated at Toronto last year in a public speech: "We can not forget the part that this Ulster played in the years gone by in the national fight. If in later years, through the intrigues of British statesmen, these men have been weaned from the national cause, it is not, I am convinced, a hopeless task to bring them back to the side of Ireland, to make them stand, as their fathers stood, for the defense and maintenance of Irish nationality."

It is an historical fact that 130 years ago the Protestants of Ulster were fighting with the Catholics of Ireland—the possessors and dispossessed making common cause—against England for Irish independence.

It is also a fact that some of the religious and political prejudice planted in Ulster after that era of independence still lingers. There are Ulstermen who claim their first duty is to England, not to their native land, Ireland. But I ask you to recall what Washington did with the Ulster problem on his hands in 1776. Those residents of America who preferred to remain "Loyalists" to England did so. Fifty thousand of these "Loyalists" fought in the English Army against American independence, and Washington simply regarded them as traitors to their country. It is on record that he called them "abominable pests of society." When American independence was established such of these Loyalists as desired to do so lived peacefully in America; the others moved into British territory and were recompensed by England for any pecuniary loss they suffered.

It is not even the dream of the leaders that war between half-civilized and hoggish nations can be stopped at once, but it is believed that it will prevent war in many cases and that in the course of time, patience, and unselfishness this human being will work out a plan so that the decrees of this court will be respected as much as we now respect the decrees and judgments of our State and national court. No one believes for a minute that in our courts we reach absolute justice in all cases. Justice is that most valued and priceless jewel frequently so hard to find, but civilization has taken the position in civil law that we would rather submit to the payment of the dollars which the courts say we owe and which we believe we do not owe. I say civilization has reached the point where we would rather pay it than to appeal from the courts of the country to a shotgun.

Even this great international court, hedged in by racial and religious prejudices or national interests, may in some cases work an injustice. We take the same chance in every court in this country, including the United States Supreme Court. Sometimes their opinions are given by a bare majority of one. Frequently in cases in which you have no possible interest the minority opinion may strike you as much sounder in law and logic, but under our American civilization in obedience to a high sense of Americanism we bow to that decision without dreaming of a bombing plane, a submarine, or even a "six gun" or a stiletto.

Mr. Chairman, the mere fact that such a court was established, the mere fact that its doors stood open would be an invitation to nations standing in a war-like attitude, would tend to prevent wicked and unreasonable demands on the part of one nation as a mere excuse for conquest. In the present state of mind of the people of this world no civilized nation will march into the territory of another nation, refusing an invitation into this court.

But some of the ablest and most distinguished students of diplomacy in and out of Congress say we must have peace first and trust to the future to make this league of nations. We have peace now; true, the final treaties have not been signed; and in my humble opinion unless some such court is agreed upon, as a permanent fixture in the jurisprudence of the world with power to hear submitted cases and power to enforce its decrees, we will have failed to accept this glorious opportunity now knocking at our door.

If we fail now, then American statesmanship has not reached the high level of American valor. How brave they were. Four Illinois regiments that formed the Infantry of the Thirty-third Division, from July 4 until the armistice was signed, never moved back 1 inch. Not one coward in 2,000,000 men. Why repeat the sacrifice to you? You have stood at the open grave. You have seen the mutilated still live, the deaf, the blind. We called to mothers to give their son's blood for a permanent peace, and some of the gentlemen who cried loudest for the sacrifice now shrug their shoulders and say, "What's the use, there has always been war; there will always be war." If we fail now and find that our sacrifice only meant to leave the world as it was—our dead have only given another twist to the kaleidoscope—swiftly changing the colors on the map. If we leave our enemies out to go home and in sullen despair to pay their debt and tax their people for another war; if our allies are to be able to say, see there our banner floats over an unwilling people; see we have more territory, regardless of the golden rule of self-determination; see the colonies that have changed their masters and have a new flag. If that is what our sons have died for, they have died in vain, and the world's war was a shamble and a farce. But, sir, if we can catch the spirit of the vision of peace and self-determination, it shall be ours to know that "There is a Divinity that shapes out ends," and ours to sing again, "Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of our Lord, and God is marching on." I thank you, gentlemen, for your attention. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman from Illinois consume all of his time?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; just exactly consumed his time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I beg to say in advance that I will not yield to interruptions, and I hope I shall not consume the 40 minutes which have been allotted to me.

Mr. Chairman, the President's departure from Washington to participate directly or indirectly in the peace conference soon to assemble at Versailles has unhappily evoked some criticism—criticism as to the authority and the wisdom of his mission and of his views upon the objects of his mission. But, fortunately, this House has not been the forum of originating or disseminating these criticisms, and it is the public conviction that this House does not share in these untimely and unnecessary animadversions.

HIS AUTHORITY.

Mr. Chairman, from my viewpoint, whatever may be the expediency or inexpediency of the President's extraordinary errand, no criticism thereof is justifiable at this time. Inquiries relating to his constitutional authority to absent himself from the seat of government for so long a time and at a distance so great are, of course, not untimely, for every act of the President must be sustained by the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof. Some eminent lawyers have denied the President's constitutional right thus to absent himself. This contention is comprehensively refuted by the organic authorization empowering him to make treaties, subject to the consent of two-thirds of the Senate. By usage the President has heretofore delegated to others the framing of treaties in his behalf, which he has in turn presented to the Senate for concurrence. But whatever the usage, the original power to negotiate treaties is conferred upon the President by the express language of the Constitution itself. Manifestly he can not delegate a power which he does not possess, and if he were not so expressly empowered the repeated recognition of the validity of his delegation proprio vigore presupposes the existence of such power in the President. Therefore the President has the power either directly to negotiate a treaty himself or indirectly to negotiate it through his agents. To argue that he can exercise this power only by delegation is to give to an agent more authority than is given to the principal himself. In brief, the President has the whole power to negotiate treaties, and he may delegate a portion or all of this power or he himself may exercise the whole or any part of it. And it inevitably follows that in exercising this power he may do all things necessarily incident to its exercise. To empower the President to negotiate a treaty and to forbid his presence at the time and place of its negotiation is a palpable contradiction, a plain negation of his power. An analogy is found in his constitutional authorization to act as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. It is obvious that he may execute this power by agents or he may assume it himself. If he assumes it, he may unquestionably accompany and command these forces, wherever they may lawfully be, and the Supreme Court has recently held that these forces may lawfully operate on foreign soil.

So I submit that the President may in person negotiate a treaty, and as an inexorable incident of this right he may visit such places at home or abroad and consume such time as may be necessary to conduct such negotiations. The power is clearly granted to him, and the method of its exercise is within his executive discretion, for which he is answerable to the people of America in the manner required by its institutions.

THE EXPEDIENCY OF HIS MISSION.

So much, Mr. Chairman, for the President's constitutional authority and right to absent himself from the country to participate in these negotiations. What of the expediency of his errand? There have been and are sincere differences of opinion as to the wisdom of his going abroad. But he has gone, he is in France, and he is there to exert more effectively than could be done by any other agency of our Government the great weight of this Nation to the negotiation of a proper treaty, and, in my unbiased judgment, all differences of opinion should now be composed or their expression withheld; and the President of the Nation should have, as I believe by an overwhelming majority he does have, the united and affirmative support of its people.

Mr. Chairman, I would accentuate the contention that it is the peculiar province of the President alone to determine at this vital juncture in the affairs of the world whether he can best serve America and civilization by staying at home or going abroad. The exigencies, the responsibilities, and the opportunities are best known to him. Then, too, his presence at the deliberations in Versailles has been most earnestly insisted upon by at least England and France, and their satisfaction at his presence in Europe has been expressed in the past few days by demonstrations of unprecedented magnitude and enthusiasm. So in the presence of the assembled nations he now finds his own errand approved, and shall we at this anxious period of human history impair their confidence or destroy their hopes—their confidence in us as a nation, their hopes in us as a friend? Shall we by partisan or hasty speech strike him down among those whom he and we would most serve in this agonizing hour?

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, the premiers of the allied nations will represent in person their Governments in the conference. These premiers practically appoint the representatives of their Government just as the Presidents have heretofore done for the United States. So when the premiers themselves decide to represent their Governments in the conference, there was no other course open to the President save practically to perform the same functions if the same weight and dignity were to be secured for America in the conference that will accrue to the allied Governments.

Mr. Chairman, in considering the criticisms made upon the President's errand, criticisms to which I have already alluded as well as criticisms to which I shall hereafter call attention, I would accentuate an observation that may be generally applied to them all, namely, that while any given criticism may in and of itself be wise in a given instance, another circumstance and another occasion will render the same criticism wholly unwise and positively injurious.

THE CONDUCT OF HIS MISSION.

I turn now, Mr. Chairman, to another class of criticisms; that is, criticisms relating to his manner or method of conducting or administering his mission. For example, it is contended that before his departure for France he should have taken "the American people into his confidence"; that he should have advised them in advance of the exact lines he would follow or the particular positions he would take in the conference; that he should have stated to the American public with meticulous precision his views upon the questions to be submitted to the conference and the order of precedence in which they should be considered.

We should bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that this particular criticism emanates from those who energetically resent the President's personal performance of this great diplomatic function and who insist that it shall be performed by the old accustomed method of selected and appointed commissioners. The contrast of the two methods demonstrates the sincerity or logic of the critics, for the old method is the method of concealment, the method of secrecy. So we have this palpable contradiction: The same critics who demand of him a more definite expression of our international objects in reality would not have him but his representatives, namely, his delegated agents or commissioners, who, it should not be forgotten, must necessarily exercise concealment. These critics with one breath would have the President give his views, but in the next breath they would have in place of him a commission which must inexorably withhold their views. Therefore what other conclusion can be drawn than that the purpose of this criticism is not to secure a more definite expression of the objects of our Nation at the conference but to destroy the influence of the President in the performance of his mission by misleading the people to believe that the President should do what it is impracticable for him or any other agent of our Government to do?

Mr. Chairman, we should keep in mind that the President does not go to dictate but to help negotiate a treaty. Why, then, should we demand the particulars of his policies? Has he not already gone far beyond the other participating Governments in outlining the purposes and objects of his country? What of his "fourteen points" and other addresses, all of which have been directed to the precise subjects that will be submitted to the conference?

COMPOSITION OF THE COMMISSION.

Mr. Chairman, the President has incurred some criticism because he did not constitute the commission in whole or in part of Senators, the basis of the criticism being that the Senate itself would thereby be better informed regarding the details and temper of the conference from time to time. Obviously all of the proceedings of the conference, whether in full session or sitting in sections or committees, will be accurately recorded, preserved, and made available. Steam, mails, telegraph and telephone, stenography, and the press, all will combine to keep the Senate in intimate and adequate touch with the conference and all of its deliberations and conclusions. The "incidents living as they rise," the facts substantive or cognate, the arguments, relevant and irrelevant, all will be caught in repose or in motion and may be easily placed before the Senate. But why should the President be charged with this omission now? The United States has negotiated or been party to over 600 treaties, and I can recall only one of these the signers of which were in whole or in part Members of the Senate, and that one was the Spanish-American peace treaty. It is true that Senators have sat in arbitrations or other councils in some few instances, but these tribunals negotiated no treaties, though subsequent treaties sometimes preserved and perfected their conclusions or findings. On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, there has been for some years, certainly since the Spanish-American peace treaty, a noticeable public sentiment in opposition to senatorial membership of treaty conferences. And for the commanding reason that the public interest is the better served and promoted, the real purpose of the Constitution the better expressed and applied, by holding that great tribunal in reserve as a revisory or appellate agency, detached in interest or association, calm and judicial, to consider and concur or nonconcur in the treaty submitted by the Executive. This desirable achievement can never be fully accomplished if that body must pass upon work partly or largely from the hands of its own membership. [Prolonged applause.]

Of course, I would not be understood to controvert the full right of the Senate to advise the President in respect of contemplated treaties. This has been done from time to time, and Presidents have even gone so far as to ask in advance for this advice, but the advice of the Senate in its collective or collegiate capacity is very different from the actual consent or review by the Senate of the action of its individual Members in negotiating treaties. One action is free from the personal equation, while the other is embarrassed by the personal factor.

HIS UNDISCLOSED PURPOSES.

Mr. Chairman, animadversions have been directed to what is alleged to be the vicious or uncertain meaning of some of the items of the President's "fourteen points" address. For example, the danger said by some to be found in his views respecting economic barriers, and the indefiniteness of his views as to armaments and freedom of the seas. Criticisms of these three propositions are based mainly upon assumptions as to the President's meaning, despite the fact that as to economic barriers he has written letters expressly disclaiming the meaning or interpretation imputed to him, expressly disclaiming any purpose or plan whereby the economic or fiscal policy of the Nation may be interfered with or in any manner controlled save by the unhampered constitutional agencies of the Government.

The question of proportional or relative reduction of armaments can, of course, only be wisely and practically considered and determined in the conference itself. But that there is a serious purpose in the mind of the civilized world to secure a reduction of armaments, either immediately or gradually, is beyond question, and the President merely expresses this righteous desire. Are the allied Governments more definite in their expressions as to conscription and standing armies? Indeed, Mr. Chairman, has any of the Governments likely to participate in the conference been more definite in expressing its views upon the subjects to be considered than our own Government through its President?

And of the freedom of the seas? America has always favored this freedom, which has perhaps been one of her three traditional and historic foreign policies. Does the President's language authorize an unprecedented extension or limitation of this freedom? Let his words answer:

> Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.

I submit that in this language the President simply makes a pronouncement of the general policy of America and of civilized nations respecting the lawful use of the seas, and that the detail or concrete enlargement or abridgment of the rights of navigation is preeminently a matter to be considered and adjusted at the council table.

A LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. Chairman, the storm center of criticism, though very late in gathering, is directed at the President's attitude on a league of nations. This criticism declares that the proposed league means either too much or too little and that, in any event, it should not be considered at the peace conference. I imagine the President claims no originality for the idea of establishing such a league. Many men in America have favored such an international arrangement for some years, notably ex-President Taft and Mr. Lowell, president of Harvard University. The plan brought forward by the association headed by these eminent men gives a rather distinct outline of the object and plan of the league, which may be found in the current literature of the day. The subject, however, seems to have been even more profoundly discussed in England, and I hear in France as well.

Dr. David Jayne Hill, a distinguished publicist, has in a recent article given the names of those who have made special study of the scheme. He does not, however, mention what to me appears to be the most philosophical of recent discussions, namely, two articles appearing in the Edinburgh Review by W. Alison Phillips. This writer puts his finger upon the vital joint in the armor; that is, the success of the league depends largely upon the development of a cosmopolitan patriotism which in given instances may be paramount to our national patriotism—broadly, that our allegiance to the league may be greater than our allegiance to the Nation. Viscount Bryce not only attempts to answer, with his accustomed penetration and learning, this particular argument but presents an able and favorable discussion of the whole subject in what, I believe, is the last published volume of his writings.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the ultra-conservative thinkers contend that the impracticability of the league is shown by several historical examples. They cite alleged former similar attempts of nations and contend that all of them have been failures. For example, some 900 years ago mediaevel Christendom undertook to stop feudal wars by a league known as the "truce of God," supported by solemn religious oaths and by armed forces. Following the peace of Utrecht, the Abbé de St. Pierre, in 1713, published his scheme for perpetual peace, from which the Russian Emperor Alexander developed the project that he submitted to Pitt in 1804, and which was revised and developed after the downfall of Napoleon into what is known as the Holy Roman Alliance, which was neither holy nor Roman and against which ambitious undertaking America proclaimed the Monroe doctrine. There may be other instances, and certainly men as great as Grotius and Kant have devoted profound and practical consideration to the subject.

I am an ardent supporter, Mr. Chairman, of the purposes of a league of nations, but I have some misgivings as to the success of its practical administration. But when I consider the immeasurable loss and welter, the incomparable misery and agony imposed by this great war whose end is not yet visible, I can not be indifferent to any plan which aims to prevent a repetition of such a catastrophe. [Applause.] Nor do I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the leagues mentioned by the eminent publicists afford a formidable or deterrent analogy. The political, social, economic, and industrial systems, as well as the civilizations of that day and of to-day are so unlike that the free governments of our time are not justified in withholding from the plan their most sympathetic consideration. I for one am not willing to close my ears to the voices from millions of graves, to shut my eyes to the millions of wounded and suffering peoples, and to immeasurable areas of destruction, and thereby contribute in the slightest degree to the embarrassment or defeat of a plan to which a stricken world looks forward with longing hopes. What other device or remedy is offered? Shall the nations tread again the wearisome road from Vienna to Versailles? We can not stand still.

> He that considereth the wind shall not sow, and he that looketh to the clouds shall not reap.

So the voice of the ancient seer bids us to take a step, to take a chance. Must we not, therefore, at least give our approval to the consideration by the conference of a league of nations supported, in the language of the President—> by a reign of law based on the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind?

Mr. Chairman, can we not make a more rational classification of the law? Why, for example, should individual homicide be crime and collective homicide directed by the state be innocence? Why should not crimes committed by a state be the concern of all of the family of nations as much so as a crime by the person is the concern of every individual of the State? Why should criminal law apply to the crimes of persons and the civil law, the law of property and of contracts, apply to the crimes of nations? May not a league of nations afford the medium by which a rational and moral reclassification of the law of nations may be made to fit the crimes of the state?

Nor can I concur, Mr. Chairman, in the criticism that the President would favor or the conference would develop any plan for a league of nations that would affect the sovereignty of our Nation, or the vigor of our constitutional system, or our internal and domestic powers and policies.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told that the President should be more definite in his expressions as to the objects and workings of the proposed league of nations. Is he not as clear as is Clemenceau's "balance of power" device? And is not this "balance of power" to be established by a league or agreement of nations? There are leagues and leagues—leagues of ambition and leagues of conscience, and this great war has been fought for the supremacy of the moral forces of the world. Shall we trudge along the same old road to come again at the end of fifty or a hundred years to another field of blood, to another hurricane of gas, to another fire from heaven, to another upheaval of the seas? Will the years to come forgive us unless we hold out now some hope to mankind that the light of peace will shine longer and more uninterruptedly upon earth than it has ever heretofore done? [Applause.]

A MORE CONVENIENT SEASON.

There is, Mr. Chairman, another criticism of this immediate subject to which I have heretofore alluded. That is that, though a league of nations may be expedient, yet the pending Versailles conference is not the time or the place to deal with the subject; that this conference should deal with peace alone; and that such subjects as armaments, the law of the seas, and the league of nations should await another day and another place. All I have to say as to this, Mr. Chairman, is that if these subjects are not considered by this conference and are postponed to another day and another place, then that other day and other place may not come until the world shall have passed through another and greater catastrophe than the one that now occasions the coming conference at Versailles.

Mr. Chairman, I would submit in this connection a more serious thought. Some one has said that great revolutions occur without being known at the time. But are we ignorant of the present ominous symptoms? Do we not hear strange sounds, and do we not see portentous signs? Are there not sinister and abhorrent forces moving about in the slime and welter of the aftermath of this great war? Behold Germany and Russia and the Bolshevik. Coming from the common heart of humanity, is there not the threat that civilizations should end wars or revolutions may end civilizations? From every group of peoples the world over do we not hear the insistent demand that statesmanship should speedily set up some device that will materially limit or prevent the recurrence of wars? Is there any known design other than a league of nations? And if we do not try it out in some form, what is left to us? A critical, a terrible moment, confronts the world. Shall we wait for another upheaval? Shall we wait for the procession of the dark ages? So-called historic precedents, sustained by the brilliance of pen or the eloquence of senates, will not answer the question. Some serious, tangible effort must be made or civilization may well be anxious as to the fabric and foundation of political institutions.

Mr. Chairman, I wish in conclusion to say that there is as much need of unity of action to-day in support of the conference as there was for unity of command for the success of the allied armies on the field of battle. Amidst the tribulations of Europe the President now seems to carry the one healing touch. In the courts and chancelleries of Europe he is the most hopeful and commanding figure [applause]—independent, initiative, and courageous. He is lifting high before the peoples of the world the standards of a virtuous democracy. He is not encumbering his task with the questions of the equipoise and balance of powers. He is dealing broadly with the principles which make for an enduring peace. He is confronting immense perplexities, infinite difficulties, and stubborn congeries of traditions and castes, and the spirit of America that all unconsciously sustains his counsel and compels his action should give hope and confidence to the people of America. Therefore, not as a partisan, but as an American, I congratulate the House, which constitutes the most concrete and multiform expression of the will of the American people, upon the temper and judgment it has heretofore exhibited, and to express the hope that in this vital hour the American people shall sustain the efforts of the President and our representatives abroad, as I believe they now do and will continue to do. Their failure will be our failure and their success will be our success. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back such time as I have not consumed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on last Saturday I requested unanimous consent to address the House, but yielding to the suggestion of the minority leader [Mr. MANN], who was very courteous in his suggested objection, I succeeded in obtaining time through the courtesy of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

I doubt very much—indeed, I am quite sure of the fact—whether what I have to say will be as interesting or as entertaining or as beneficial, possibly, as the very learned and instructive remarks that we have just heard from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] or as those that we heard from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], and therefore I crave the indulgence of the committee and possibly ask for the patience of the committee in approaching a subject which, although very interesting and perhaps instructive, is not very entertaining. And yet I believe that to-day it is one of the most important matters now before the people of the country. It is this great railroad problem. What shall we do with the transportation systems of this country?

The President, when he last addressed the Congress, used the following words and pointed out three different modes of procedure:

> We can simply release the roads and go back to the old conditions of private management, unrestricted competition, and multiform regulation by both State and Federal authorities; or we can go to the opposite extreme and establish complete Government control, accompanied, if necessary, by actual Government ownership; or we can adopt an intermediate course of modified private control under a more unified and affirmative public regulation and under such alterations of the law as will permit wasteful competition to be avoided and a considerable degree of unification of administration to be effected.

He was frank enough to say to the Congress that as to these three courses he had no definite choice, nor did he have any definite recommendation to make. But coming as he did before the Congress and presenting the question to us, it seems to me that it becomes the duty of the Congress to speedily—and as speedily as the circumstances will warrant—find some remedy for the evils which we all admit to be existent.

In approaching this subject it is well enough to recognize that we have a great problem. In the first place, there are so many different and diverse interests. We have the public, consisting of the shippers and the travelers and consumers. We have the Government itself, which is vitally interested. We have the stockholders and the bondholders of the various corporations making up the transportation systems of the country. And then, last but not least, we have the employees, and all these diverse interests are vitally concerned with this proposition.

Mr. EMERSON. We have the consumers also.

Mr. DEWALT. And the consumers as well. I was going to speak of them in connection with the public at large, because after all the public pays the freight in the ultimate analysis. Now, in many points these different interests, whilst they converge, nevertheless are sometimes antagonistic. When we consider the enormity of this problem, let me say to you that the total trackage of the railroads in operation on January 1, 1917, was 397,014 miles, and that trackage system was owned by 2,095 different companies in the realm of the United States. The number of employees was 1,700,000, almost as many men as we had in France fighting for the liberties of the world. The outstanding bonds of these various corporations were $10,875,206,665, and the stock at par value aggregated $8,755,403,517.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Would it interfere with the gentleman's argument to ask a question there?

Mr. DEWALT. Not at all, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What was the market value of that stock?

Mr. DEWALT. I have no means of ascertaining, except to say that the fluctuation in the market gradually increased during the year 1916, and then decreased after that time.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Has the gentleman the number of security holders?

Mr. DEWALT. I have not. Take these alone, the interest of the stockholders and the bondholders in these various corporations, the enormous amount of money invested and invested by the public at large, securities held by orphans, trustees of orphans, insurance companies, banks, stockholders who are enumerated throughout the entire country, little and large, if you please, and then take in conjunction with that the fact that there are 1,700,000 employees engaged in the operation of these railroads, and then take the concluding fact to which the gentleman from Ohio has just referred, that here we have a public of 110,000,000 people who are daily using the transportation systems of this country either by travel or by the carriage of freight, they ultimately, as I have suggested, must pay the freight, and you see, as I have said, the enormous problem that confronts the Congress of this country.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Can the gentleman state the number of stockholders throughout the country?

Mr. DEWALT. I can not. Therefore it seems almost effrontery for one who has had as little experience as I have in legislative matters, particularly here in the House of Representatives, to attempt in any way to formulate a system which may be of some effective force.

And whilst I am going on with this argument—because I propose to make it an argument if I possibly can, instead of a speech—I want with all modesty to say that the ideas I have formulated I do not attempt by any means to assert are perfect; nor do I claim entire credit for what I have formulated, because many of the ideas that I have in the bill that I will afterwards introduce, or which has been introduced, have been gained by my experience on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and have been gained by conversation and observation of the methods and knowledge that the other members of that committee had, far superior to my own. Further than that, I have consulted in very large measure Mr. William Cook, the author of Cook on Corporations, who has examined this subject with particular care and attention.

After considering the enormous magnitude of this problem, is there any necessity for legislation of this kind? I doubt very much whether there is anyone in my hearing, whether there be anywhere anyone, who will contradict the assertion that the public has been inconvenienced during the last year during which we have had Federal administration. I doubt very much whether anyone will controvert the position that I now take, that the expenditures under Federal control have been far in excess of those that we had during private management. In fact, it is an established fact now that the deficit under Federal control is $796,000,000. That is not chargeable to inefficiency; that is not chargeable possibly to waste or mismanagement; but it is chargeable to the fact that we were operating under extraordinary circumstances in extraordinary times. But nevertheless the fact remains that, for reasons which are apparent upon the face of the record and disclosed by evidence satisfactory to anyone who examines it, there is this deficit, caused not alone by Federal administration of the roads but caused by concurrent circumstances during that time.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry there?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The statement I have seen in the papers was that that deficit was $136,000,000. The gentleman says it is $700,000,000.

Mr. DEWALT. It is $796,000,000. That is the true figure.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Is that exclusive of the amount appropriated by Congress for the railroads?

Mr. DEWALT. No.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. It includes that?

Mr. DEWALT. It includes that; yes.

Then, more than all that, which to me is a very potent fact, we have had during the course of Federal administration of these various roads and prior to that time a conflict of authority between the States of the Union and the Federal authorities, a matter which to my mind, as a lawyer and as a patient investigator of a part of this subject, is totally abhorent to any good management. What do I mean by that? There is no doubt that as a proposition of law—and I am addressing myself largely now to the legal side of this proposition—the States have the right to control commerce within their own territory, and so far as intrastate traffic is concerned the State authorities, if they choose to exercise that authority, have the right so to do. But there is no doubt of the other proposition, that when the Federal authority, in the exercise of the commerce clause of the Constitution, does or attempts to exercise authority even as to intrastate traffic which is intermingled with interstate traffic, then the power of the Federal Government is supreme and paramount. The Minnesota rate case has gone so far as to say that the State authorities may, for the public health of its inhabitants and for the welfare of the inhabifants of the State, control intrastate traffic, but that so soon as the Federal Government exercises its authority wherever interstate commerce is mingled with State traffic, there, upon the assumption or exercise of that power by the Federal Government, the Federal power becomes paramount and supreme.

Therefore I take it as a sound legal proposition that there must be in the near future, if we desire efficient management of the transportation systems of the country, a radical change, and that radical change ought to be with the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal authorities by the exercise of a proper agency for supreme and ultimate control, not only of rates but of other appliances in regard to transportation, except in so far as that traffic is entirely included within State borders. If that be a good proposition not only legally, but according to common sense, then it seems to me that I have pointed out to this committee not only the reasons for legislation but the necessity for legislation.

Mr. Chairman, it is easy to find fault. Anyone can say to anyone else, You are a sick man, and anyone can sympathize with that sick man, but it requires a skilled physician and it requires more than sympathy to give a potent remedy for the disease from which the man is suffering. Therefore you have a right to say to me whilst I am addressing you, "Admitting that the patient is ill, admitting that there is necessity for legislation, admitting the largeness of the proposition you are about to discuss, what is your remedy?" As I before said, I have tried to formulate that remedy. I have tried to formulate it by introducing a bill in this House, which, with all due modesty, I again repeat I desire each and all of you who are interested in this subject to examine, to criticize, to reform, to remodel, because I do not claim for it perfection, nor do I claim for it all-wise knowledge. He who attempts to assert that he knows all things has not yet learned the beginning of wisdom, because the beginning of wisdom is to know that you know nothing.

What do I propose in this legislation? In the first place, in the bill introduced I create an executive department headed by a secretary of railroads, who shall be a member of the Cabinet, and be paid the same salary as a member of the Cabinet, and who, of course, shall be nominated by the President of the United States, and who shall be confirmed by the Senate, if the Senate so sees fit. I then divide the territorial limits of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, into five regional districts, something upon the order of the divisions of the reserve bank system. I place marking of the territorial limits geographically, as to the needs of commerce and as to the needs of the railroads in these various geographical districts, in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission and say by the bill that the Interstate Commerce Commission, having due regard to the needs of commerce and to geographical location, shall carve out of this territory five districts, or, at most, nine; not more than nine.

I then create Federal railroad companies, and they are created by a Federal railroad board. That Federal railroad board consists of six members. One of those members is the executive head of the department, to wit, the Cabinet officer. The other five are selected in a manner which I shall afterwards give to you, but they must all be confirmed by the Senate of the United States, and if there be a vacancy that vacancy can be filled by the President of the United States, but his tenure of office shall not last more than 30 days after the convening of the next session of the Senate, so as to give the Senate the opportunity of acting on the nomination thus made. After this Federal railroad board is constituted they are in turn to constitute and organize Federal railroad companies in these various districts. They are to select nine men, and those nine men are to form a Federal railroad corporation in the district. Those nine men having formed this corporation by subscribing to stock, which is $10 a share, and each one of them having $1,000 worth of shares, constitute the corporation, and they have all of the inherent powers which are given to a corporation, to sue and be sued, to make contracts in regard to all railroad matters, to buy and to sell, to settle and dispute, to recognize the courts of law, and to be recognized by the courts of law, in all of the proceedings inherent to and concurrent with corporate legislation. But more than that, they have the power then to condemn, if you please, railroad property, and to take it by condemnation proceedings, but those condemnation proceedings shall be in the jurisdiction of the State authorities and not the Federal authorities, to wit, the condemnation proceedings for the taking of the property shall be local proceedings, and if the property be taken in the State of Pennsylvania, the Pennsylvania courts shall have jurisdiction under the usual forms of procedure in regard to condemnation proceedings. After this corporation is formed they also have the right of issuance of stock, and for what purpose? To buy, if you please, the outstanding stock of the railroad companies in their various regional districts. To make it more plain, the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. in one of these districts, or the Federal corporation in these regional districts, issues its stock, and in turn that stock may be taken by John Jones, who is one of the stockholders of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., as an exchange for the stock of the Federal corporation. If he refuses so to do, it is up to him, but the Federal corporation in this region has the right to acquire by the issuance of its stock, or the raising of money upon its stock, which raising of money becomes easy by a different provision in the bill, to purchase all or any portion of the stock of the various companies in the district, which is within the circumscribed limits of the region.

After that stock has been purchased, or while it is still outstanding, the corporation within the district, however, preserves its personal identity. The Pennsylvania Railroad Co. does not lose its identity; the New Jersey Central Railroad Co. does not lose its identity. They in turn select their directors by a vote of stock. If the Federal organization within the regional districts has control of the stock or a majority of the stock of the New Jersey Central, then they elect the directories; but those directors must be residents within the territory within which the road is located.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Would not the proposal of the gentleman authorizing the local Federal board, which is the corporation, to buy the stock existing and the bonds existing, make his scheme in effect Government ownership?

Mr. DEWALT. It would not be Government ownership unless the Government itself through a holding corporation acquired all of the stock or a majority thereof. Then it would be; yes.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I mean.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; it would be.

Mr. MADDEN. In effect.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The foundation the gentleman is laying is a foundation for the ownership of railroads by the Government of the United States without the expenditure of any money. Is that it?

Mr. DEWALT. No; it would scarcely be that, because it would be the expenditure of money; it would be the issuance of stock which afterwards is guaranteed by the Federal Government itself; and more than that, there would be no necessity in buying the bonds of the various outlying corporations because those bonds are a first lien on the property itself, and are always the best of security.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman's plan contemplate allowing bonds to remain intact and taking control of the stock by exchange or condemnation or purchase?

Mr. DEWALT. By condemnation or purchase.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I might overstate it in talking about bonds——

Mr. DEWALT. Of course, that would remain upon the property as a first lien. How, when this stock is issued, does it become of value to the parties who desire to obtain it? In order that this stock may be used by the people who wish to have the backing of the Government, I provide in this bill that the Government of the United States shall guarantee a 3 per cent dividend upon this stock, that the dividend upon the stock shall be no greater than 6 per cent, and if more than 3 per cent is earned, of course the stockholder gets this per cent, but the guarantee of the Government is 3 per cent, which makes the stock a valuable asset to investment holders and investment seekers. It might be said they can get more than 3 per cent, but this bill has an added feature, that the stock may be used in the reserve banks of the country, and it may be used as collateral in national banks and that national banks may deal in the stock and use it as collateral for loans, thus making it not a liquid asset in the currency of the country but making it a negotiable asset for the securing of loans for the conduct of business, and it therefore becomes not what you would call currency or a liquid asset but an available asset for business transactions. But some of these might earn more than 6 per cent. What, then, shall be done with the balance above the 6 per cent? The bill then provides that if more than 6 per cent shall be earned by any one of these regional or Federal corporations that one-half of the excess above 3 per cent shall be Government property and shall be used for betterments, improvements, and so forth, and the purchase of the outlying stock of the regional corporation if seen so fit or the retirement of bonds, and that the excess of one-half shall be given to the regional corporation for the use of the companies and they in turn to pay as much as necessary thereof for betterments and improvements.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman expect to explain in his time the relation of these zones one to the other, the overlapping, and how he controls the income of a certain railroad in one certain zone which extends over into another zone?

Mr. DEWALT. I shall be glad to do that very soon.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The Government guarantees 3 per cent, but in no event shall there be an earning capacity of over 6 per cent?

Mr. DEWALT. No; the earning capacity may be 20 per cent.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. But not over 6 per cent can go to the stockholder. Is this stock free from taxation? It should not be exempt from taxation.

Mr. DEWALT. The stock would not be free from taxation, but would be subject to State taxation.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Upon an earning of 3 per cent alone, could that be made attractive to purchasers of the stock?

Mr. DEWALT. I doubt whether it would in that relation; but that, after all, is but a mathematical calculation and clearly goes to what we call a large measure of the bill, and it might be a matter of minutia, it might be a matter to consider in the amount to be floated, but we do know that 3 and 3½ "per cents" guaranteed by the Government are considered to be very attractive.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. Now, the whole hornets' nest of this whole railroad proposition is this——

Mr. DEWALT. As long as the gentleman omits the hornets I do not care about the nest.

Mr. EMERSON. You will find it is a hornets' nest before we get through with it; but the Director General, in taking over the roads, has raised the pay of the men, then he raised the fares, and then he passes it over to us, dumps it on our porch to take care of, and that is the hornets' nest.

Mr. DEWALT. That is a condition; that is not argumentative; it is nothing more than assertion. It is one of the things we have to meet whether it is a hornets' nest or not; it neither diminishes nor enlarges the efficacy of the proposition we are considering. I admit in the beginning we had these difficulties to contend with. Knowing the condition, it is useless to say, Here we are; and the next question is, What are you going to do about it? I admit all you say, and I admit the great strength of it, too, because I know what the figures show. They say:

At the very outset of his administration the Director General started to economize on railway operation by separating 400 officers drawing salaries of $5,000 a year or over from the railway operating pay roll. "Under private control," says he in his report of his seven months' stewardship, "salaries as high as $100,000 per annum were paid to officers of railroad corporations. Under Government control the highest salaries paid are to the regional directors (of whom there are seven), and these salaries range from $40,000 to $50,000 per annum." By this strike Federal control saved $4,614,889 a year in operating cost——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is making a very interesting and instructive address; does he desire some more time?

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman give me 10 minutes?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. DEWALT (continuing reading)—

But by a succession of orders Mr. McAdoo has added something like $700,000,000 annually to the pay rolls of the railways, without adding one foot-pound to the efficiency of the 1,800,000 employees.

And, worse than that, we are partly responsible for the situation, may I suggest to the gentleman? When we passed the Adamson bill there was an increase of $268,471,074 in pay of railway employees in 1917 over 1916, and $196,240,000 of this may be traced directly to the Adamson law and to the advances incident to putting the new law into effect.

So the Director General was not at all to blame for this extraordinary circumstance. We passed the Adamson law, and I think we rightfully passed it, and I think it was of benefit ultimately to the Nation at large to have it passed; but that does not alter the circumstance. The fact remains that there was this increase of expenditure in operating expenses, and although the increase of income was large it was not sufficient to meet the expenditures; and therefore this deficit.

I might go on with the bill, and I should be very glad to explain another feature thereof. I provide in this bill for something else which is consistent also with the Federal reserve act, to wit, an advisory council. This advisory council is to consist of 10 members. Those members are to be selected by the different regional railroads within the region; but I provide that all of those men on the advisory council must be resident within the district, and all of them must have continuous residence for at least nine months to two years prior to their selection for these places; and I provide that three of these men shall be representatives of labor connected with the labor organizations of the railroad companies. I have been insistent, and will always be, as one who worked on the railroads himself, that there are certain inalienable rights that every workman has, and one of those rights is representation where his wages are concerned. But I have provided also in this bill that in these directorates there must be a representation of labor, and when a vacancy occurs in that representation upon the directorate, if that vacancy is to be filled, it must be filled by the selection of somebody connected with the labor organizations of the various railroad companies.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. ROSE. Does the gentleman prohibit the construction of railroads by private capital?

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, no. You can build all the railroads you desire.

Mr. ROSE. And what becomes of them after they are constructed, under your proposed bill?

Mr. DEWALT. God only knows what becomes of anything that is constructed by anybody else. They will take care of themselves. Even in the making of shoes, if the Government made all the shoes that were to be consumed, it would not prohibit you and me from manufacturing them.

Mr. ROSE. I was wondering if under the items of the bill you have been discussing you provide that all these railroads should be taken over by the different——

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, no. There are 765 of what we call short lines. The rest of them are not all trunk lines, but concurrent with the trunk traffic. The other question you might present in the same way—and that is one of the vital things in connection with this bill—is this: What shall you do about the rates? Under the railway-control bill that we now have, Federal control, the President has initiative power in the making of rates and the fixing of rates. There is no doubt about that. Now, shall this question of rates remain with the Interstate Commerce Commission? The great trouble with the Interstate Commerce Commission—and I say it in no detriment at all to their functions and their exercise thereof—was this, that in spite of the insistent demands of the railroad companies, in spite of the pleas of the railroad companies that they could not make enough money to carry on the traffic of the country, when it was demonstrated beyond doubt they could not go into the market and get credit on their securities in order to get money for their equipment, and when the war came, when they were totally inefficient to take care of the traffic they were receiving—in spite of that thing the Interstate Commerce Commission refused to give them a raise of rates but insisted on their improving the service. When the Federal Government took control of the railroads it raised the rates 25 per cent, and in some instances more. They raised the wages almost as high as 43 per cent in some instances, and then they had what they call efficient control. I maintain now, and I think without fear of successful contradiction, that if the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal authorities had been as generous or as wise—let us put it that way—as they should have been in the raising of rates according to reasonable demands, we would not have had the trouble we had with the railroads.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. In regard to what the gentleman has said about percentage of increase in the rates, as to 25 per cent being the minimum rate, it ran up as high as 900 per cent.

Mr. DEWALT. I do not know anything about the 900. I did not get as high as those figures, but I do know about the 43.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman does not intend to convey the impression as to these rates that if that had been done at first these rates would have been raised as high?

Mr. DEWALT. I do not understand.

Mr. RAYBURN. You say rates were raised horizontally all over the country 25 per cent. You say that if the Interstate Commerce Commission had been generous with the railroads they could have operated and we would not have had to take them over. Does the gentleman intend to say that he thinks, even though they had possibly the same conditions that we had when the Interstate Commerce Commission increased these rates, that the horizontal increase would have been made?

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, no. Nor would my remarks bear out that inference. But I do maintain the business proposition that you can not have the invested capital of this country in railroads or any other enterprise unless you give that enterprise a sufficient income to manage its operation and return dividends to its stockholders. You may say they inflated their stock. I grant you that to some extent. You may say there was an overvaluation of railroads, and I grant you that to some extent. But I maintain as a business proposition, from the experience of the Pennsylvania Railroad, which is considered to be one of the best managed railroads in this or any other country, if they were not able to live and pay dividends to their stockholders that they could not have raised the credit necessary to buy equipment when the war came.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman will admit also that the railroads paid a larger percentage the year before the Government took them under Federal control than they had had since 1910?

Mr. DEWALT. I think the table of 1916 had the largest percentage of dividends. Nevertheless, the gentleman will also admit, from what took place in the Interstate Commerce Commission investigation, that they had not increased their workmen's wages or terminal and trackage facilities, simply because they could not raise the money.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think that one reason, and the main reason, why the railroads have been unable to raise money in this country and sell their securities is that they had reached the point where their securities in a great many instances did not stand for anything. And that was a vanishing hope.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. You stated a moment ago that this rate question was one of the most important. I believe so. What about the wage question? Do you not think that is one of the most important in the operation of railroads, too?

Mr. DEWALT. They are correlative.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If you will pardon me, do you not think that the wage-making power ought to have something to say in regard to the wages of the employees?

Mr. DEWALT. I have provided for that in this bill by their representation upon these directorates. And more than that, I took the position at the time the Adamson bill was before the Supreme Court, in discussion with one of the best lawyers in this House—and I do not pretend by any means to compare with him in legal ability—that the time would come, and it did come, when they decided the Adamson case, that they would also at least inferentially decide that the question of wages was within Federal jurisdiction and the power of Congress; and I will tell you why.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I ask for a little more time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. DEWALT. When you make up rates you have got to take into consideration every component part that goes into the rate. One of the greatest component parts of that rate is the wage of the man who operates the railroad train or the fellow at the switch or the man in the tower house. Whatever occupation he has in regard to the operation, whether he be a superintendent or track walker, goes into the wage problem, and whenever you make your scale of rates you have to take that into consideration. Therefore if the United States, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, has the right to regulate rates, I take it as a part of that proposition that the Interstate Commerce Commission would also have the right to regulate wages. That is the proposition.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DEWALT. I will yield first to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Is it not a fact that under private ownership and operation the Interstate Commerce Commission has nothing at all to do with wages, and yet they fixed the rates?

Mr. DEWALT. That is right. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I have listened with interest to the gentleman's statement. The iron is composed of iron and labor and coal of the people that eat, including the farmer. It takes it all to run a railroad.

Mr. DEWALT. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, in the gentleman's opinion, can we by legislation cover the whole ground, from the cradle to the grave, in every possible industry and undertake to fix wages?

Mr. DEWALT. I recognize the strength of what the gentleman says, because it would be reducing the argument to what you would call the reductio ad absurdum. Nevertheless, notwithstanding the gentleman's opinion, for which I have great respect, after all legislation always has been and will be and should be confined by the Supreme Court of the United States to matters relative and pertinent to the material issue then before the court.

That being so, let us consider the argument of the gentleman from Illinois. He says the ore that goes into the rail and the man who digs the ore that goes into the furnace which makes the rail also earns wages, and therefore my proposition in regard to the rate-making power and the wage-fixing power should be in Congress or some other authority, and therefore he argues that we should also say that they should control the wages by Congress of the man who digs the ore and puts it into the furnace. That might be so, if you reduced the argument to its ultimate conclusion and finality, if it were not for another proposition, that those things are too far removed from the correlative subjects for which the legislation is had, and for that reason it would not be true.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. FOCHT. I have listened to the plan laid out by the gentleman in regard to the new method of operating our railroads, but in the presence of some very serious and widely extended opposition to Government ownership, I wish the gentleman, if he does not have time now, will, in the extension of his remarks, amplify a little in respect to the necessity, for this reason: It is a very common belief that had the Interstate Commerce Commission yielded to the importunities of the railroads the railroads might have made these extensions and provided ample accommodations for the freight and passenger traffic of the country, and that the railroads themselves, with the exception possibly of the New Haven, which was willfully wrecked, as shown by the testimony before the committees here—the railroads, I say, such as the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co., which came out of a receivership and to-day is one of the wealthiest organizations in the world, paying a high dividend, and the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., the best operated organization of any on this earth, not excluding the United States Government itself, paying a high dividend, and the Northern Pacific, and the Great Northern, and the Union Pacific, and the Illinois Central——

Mr. DEWALT. Will you permit me to interrupt you a moment? I would like to have this incorporated in my remarks as a part of my speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOCHT. The thought I would like to have the gentleman present is, first, before you talk so much about the new plan, what is the necessity of complicating this ramifying railroad system, financially and otherwise, with the Government? That is the idea. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEWALT. I append herewith the bill I introduced on January 11, 1919:

A bill (H. R. 14186) to provide for the incorporation of Federal railroad companies and the regulation thereof, and to establish a system of supervision of railroads in the United States, and for other purposes.

DEFINITION OF TERMS.

Be it enacted, etc., That wherever the words "Federal railroad company" are used in this act the words shall be construed to refer to each of the corporations to be organized under this act, as hereinafter provided.

The words "Federal railroad board" used in this act shall be construed to mean the board of nine members herein provided for.

The words "secretary of railroads" used in this act shall be construed to be the head, at the seat of government, of an executive department to be known as the department of railroads, said head to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Said appointee shall receive a salary of $12,000 per annum and his term and tenure of office shall be uniform with other members of the President's Cabinet.

FEDERAL RAILROAD DISTRICTS.

SEC. 2. That continental United States, excluding Alaska, is to be divided into five districts, to be known and designated as (1) New England railroad district, (2) central railroad district, (3) southern railroad district, (4) northwestern railroad district, and (5) central Pacific railroad district. The aforesaid railroad districts as designated by name shall each include territorially such portions of continental United States as shall be prescribed and determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, having due regard to geographical lines and traffic requirements.

SEC. 3. That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, as soon as possible after the passage of this act, determine and designate the territory of the various railroad districts hereinbefore specified in section 2 of this act and make report of the same to the Federal railroad board hereinbefore designated; and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have power, from time to time as necessity demands, to increase the number of districts to, but not beyond, nine, and to change the territorial limits and boundaries of such districts.

FEDERAL RAILROAD COMPANIES.

SEC. 4. That the Federal railroad board shall supervise the organization in each of the said districts of a Federal railroad company by nine individuals in each district selected by the Federal railroad board, and thereupon such individuals thus selected in each district shall, under their seals, make an organization certificate which shall specifically state the name of such Federal railroad company, the territory and extent of the district as defined by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the lines of railroad included therein as defined in section 2 of this act, the city and State in which its principal office is to be located in said district, the amount of capital stock ($9,000), and the number of shares into which the same is divided ($10 each), and the number of shares subscribed for by each incorporator (100), and the said organization certificate shall be acknowledged before a judge of some court of record or notary public; and shall be, together with the acknowledgment thereof, authenticated by the seal of said court or notary, transmitted to the secretary of railroads, who shall file, record, and preserve the same in his office. Upon the filing of such certificates with the secretary of railroads as aforesaid, each of the said Federal railroad companies shall become a body corporate, and as such and in the name designated in such certificate shall have power—

First. To adopt and use a corporate seal; to have succession in perpetuity, unless it is sooner dissolved by act of Congress or unless its franchise becomes forfeited by some violation of law; to make contracts; to sue and to be sued in any court of law or equity; to appoint by its board of directors such officers and employees as are not otherwise provided for in this act, to define their duties, require bonds of them and to fix the penalty thereof, and to dismiss such officers or employees; to prescribe by its board of directors by-laws not inconsistent with law, regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted, and the privileges granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed; to exercise such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

Second. To acquire, hold, and exercise the power of ownership of any or all of the shares of the capital stock and bonds and other obligations of any or all railroad companies within its district as aforesaid; also to construct, acquire, maintain, and operate railroads within its district; also to issue shares of its capital stock from time to time, either for cash or in exchange for shares of stock or bonds or other obligations of any and all railroad corporations within its district on such basis of exchange as may be authorized by its board of directors; also to issue shares of its capital stock from time to time for such purposes (including its own expenses and disbursements) connected with or incidental to the control, acquisition, construction, management, use, and development of railroads, railroad business and railroad stock, bonds, or other obligations already issued or hereafter to be issued by railroad companies within its district (including the issue of Federal railroad company stock, to provide money to enable any railroad company in its district to pay or purchase outstanding obligations or to pay for past or future improvements, equipment, or extensions, stock of such railroad company being issued to the Federal railroad company in consideration of such money) as may be determined by its board of directors; also to exercise the power, which is hereby given to it, of eminent domain, to acquire any shares of the capital stock or bonds or other obligations of any and all railroad corporations within its district or to acquire any railroads themselves or railroad property for railroad purposes in its district, whenever in its opinion it is necessary or advantageous to it to do so, by condemnation under judicial process, and the local State courts wherein such stock or property is located shall have jurisdiction of proceedings for such condemnation. The practice, pleadings, forms, and modes of proceedings in causes arising under the provisions of this act shall conform to the practice, pleadings, forms, and proceedings existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State within which such stock or property is held or located.

Third. To vote its holdings of stock and to solicit proxies from other stockholders to vote their holdings of stock in any railroad corporation in its district, and such vote of such stock and proxies by the Federal railroad company for directors in said railroad corporation or corporations shall be limited to persons who shall have resided within the district for at least nine months in each of the three years prior to the election, and have been actively engaged during said three years in the district in commerce, agriculture, or some other industrial pursuit, including railroad management, operation, or other work in connection with such management or operation, or in the practice of a profession.

SEC. 5. That at least six members of the board of directors of each Federal railroad company shall for at least nine months of each of the preceding two years have resided in the district in which they have been chosen directors. No Senator or Representative in Congress shall be an officer or director of the Federal railroad company. No director of the Federal railroad company shall be an officer, director, or employee of any other railroad company. Any director of any Federal railroad company may be removed at any time for cause by the Federal railroad board, but before such removal the director sought to be removed shall be furnished with a copy of the alleged causes for such removal and shall be given an opportunity to make defense thereto, all of which proceedings shall be a matter of record in the office of the secretary of railroads. The board of directors of each Federal railroad company shall consist of nine members, all of whom shall be appointed by the Federal railroad board, but at least three of such directors shall in some official way be connected with the employees of the railroads of the district governed by such Federal railroad company. Protests of stockholders or by the public shall be open to public inspection. Vacancies from any cause in the boards of directors of any Federal railroad company shall be filled by the Federal railroad board, having due regard, however, to the representation of the employees of the roads in such district where the vacancy occurs. The directors of each Federal railroad company shall receive such compensation as the board of directors may determine in each instance, subject to the approval of the Federal railroad board. The board of directors of each railroad company shall at its first meeting (after its first board retires from office) designate three directors to serve one year from the next 1st day of January, and three for two years, and three for three years, and thereafter all directors shall hold office for three years. Each Federal railroad company shall every six months make a full report of its operations to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall cause the same to be printed for the information of the Congress.

SEC. 6. That there is hereby created a Federal advisory railroad council, which shall consist of two members from each Federal railroad district. Four of these members shall be appointed by the secretary of railroads, three shall be selected by the Federal railroad company directors, and three shall be elected or designated by the stockholders or directors of the various railroad companies in the regional district, but such appointments and selections shall be limited to those who have been actively engaged in commerce, agriculture, or labor, or in the management and operation of railroads. The meetings of said Federal advisory railroad council shall be held at least three times each year, and oftener if called by the secretary of railroads, in the city of Washington, D. C., or some other place deemed more suitable by the secretary of railroads at the time of such call for such meeting. The council shall select its own officers and adopt its own methods of procedure, and a majority of its members shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. Vacancies in the council shall be filled in each instance by designation as hereinbefore provided. The compensation of such advisory council shall be the sum of $25 per day for each member and necessary traveling expenses incurred by such member.

SEC. 7. That the advisory council shall have power, by itself or through its officers, to confer directly with the Federal railroad board and with the Federal railroad companies and their boards of directors, and with the boards of directors of the various railroad corporations in any or all of the regional districts on general business conditions relevant to railroad operation, management, or control; second, to make oral or written representations containing such matters to any or all of such boards or to the secretary of railroads; third, to call for information and to make recommendations in regard to the matters pertaining and relevant to railroad management, operation, and control.

SEC. 8. That the capital stock of each Federal railroad company shall be divided into shares of $10 each. The outstanding capital stock may be increased from time to time as authorized by the board of directors, but no such increase of capital stock shall be authorized without the previous consent of at least a majority of the Interstate Commerce Commission. When the capital stock of any Federal railroad company shall have been increased the board of directors shall cause to be executed a certificate to the secretary of railroads showing the increase of capital stock. The shares shall be represented by certificates which shall be transferable.

SEC. 9. That dividends on the stock of each Federal railroad company shall not exceed 6 per cent.

SEC. 10. That the United States Government hereby guarantees the payment of 3 per cent dividends on the shares of the stock of the several Federal railroad companies and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sign the name of the United States of America to a guaranty to that effect on the face of the certificates of stock issued by the corporation (the guaranty on canceled certificates to be canceled when the certificates are canceled by transfer), the form of said guaranty to be as follows:

"The United States of America hereby guarantees to the record holder of this certificate of stock the payment by the Federal railroad company issuing the same 3 per cent annual dividends on the shares of the capital stock represented by this certificate, payable semiannually on the 1st days of January and July of each year after the date of this guaranty.

"If at any time the United States of America by act of Congress ceases to pay said guaranty, the United States of America shall pay to the holders of said certificates of stock the price at which they were originally issued or the value at the time of issue of the property for which they were originally issued."

The said guaranteed rate of dividend may be varied by Congress from time to time, but not as to any issue already made.

SEC. 11. That the United States Government shall be entitled to one-half of all the profits of the said several Federal railroad companies in excess of aforesaid 6 per cent dividends, and shall apply so much thereof as is necessary for the payment of one-half of the extensions and improvements necessarily made to the various railroads, or purchase of railroad bonds or stock, or reduction of rates, or retirement of stock issued hereunder, or for any other purpose the Government may deem best in connection with the railroads, and the remaining one-half of the excess of above said 6 per cent dividends shall be retained by the several Federal railroad companies, and so much thereof as is necessary shall be applied to the payment of the remaining half of the expenses for extensions and improvements necessarily made to the railroads, or purchase of railroad bonds or stocks, or reduction of rates, or retirement of stock issued hereunder, or for any other purpose the Government may deem best in connection with the railroads.

SEC. 12. That national banks and Federal reserve banks may invest and deal in the shares of stock of the said Federal railroad companies or any of them, and such shares may be transferred to and deposited with the Treasurer of the United States in lieu of United States bonds as prescribed by sections 5159 to 5189, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended and by section 4, subdivision 8, of the Federal reserve act, and may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as security for deposits by said Treasurer of funds of the United States in national banks, and may be deposited as security for and in accordance with the act of Congress of May 30, 1908, amending the national banking laws. The board of trustees, established by act of Congress of June 25, 1910, to establish postal savings depositories may invest postal savings funds in such shares as securities of the United States within the meaning of that act. Said shares of the capital stock of said Federal railroad companies or any of them shall be receivable at par as a satisfactory collateral security for Federal reserve notes and as a reserve available as eligible paper under the Federal reserve act and as investments by Federal reserve banks.

SEC. 13. That the Federal railroad companies shall proceed with all reasonable dispatch to acquire sufficient of the outstanding capital stock of the Pennsylvania; New York Central; Illinois Central; Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul; Chicago & North Western; Union Pacific; Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe; and Southern Pacific Railroad systems to control those railroad companies; each Federal railroad company so to acquire the stock of any said railroad system or systems within its district. Such acquisition may be by purchase or by exchange of Federal railroad company's stock for the stock of said railroad system or systems or by condemnation proceedings.

FEDERAL RAILROAD BOARD.

SEC. 14. That a Federal railroad board is hereby created, which shall consist of six members, one to be the secretary of railroads and the remaining five members to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In selecting the said five members of the Federal railroad board not more than one shall be selected from any one Federal railroad district. The said five members shall devote their entire time to the business of the Federal railroad board and shall receive an annual salary of $12,000, payable monthly, together with actual necessary traveling expenses. In addition to the salaries hereinbefore provided for, each of the said six members shall each year receive $10,000 for each and every one of said five Federal railroad companies which pays its guaranteed dividend without resort to the guarantor, each year being taken by itself. No Senator nor Representative in Congress shall during his term of office, or for five years thereafter, be a member of the Federal railroad board. The members of the said board shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any railroad company, and shall not during that time hold or own stock therein. At least one of said five members shall be a person experienced in the management and operation of railroads. One member shall be designated by the President to serve for 2 years, one for 4, one for 6, one for 8, and one for 10 years, and thereafter each member so appointed shall serve for a term of 10 years, unless removed for cause by the President. Whenever a vacancy shall occur, whether by expiration of term or otherwise, among the said five members of the Federal railroad board, a successor shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill such vacancy. The President shall have power to fill all vacancies that may occur on the Federal railroad board during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire 30 days after the next session of the Senate convenes. Of the five members thus appointed one shall be designated by the President as governor and one as vice governor of the Federal railroad board. The governor of the Federal railroad board, subject to its supervision, shall be the active executive officer. A majority of the members at a meeting duly called shall constitute a quorum, and a majority of those present at such meeting shall be sufficient for affirmative action. The salaries and expenses of the Federal railroad board shall be paid by the Federal railroad companies in proportion to the respective outstanding capital stock of each from time to time. The Federal railroad board shall annually make a full report of its operations to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall cause the same to be printed for the information of the Congress. The Federal railroad board shall have power to examine, at its discretion, the accounts, books, and affairs of each Federal railroad company and to require such statements and reports as it may deem necessary, and shall at all times furnish full information to the public regarding its operations of each Federal railroad company.

SEC. 15. That said Federal railroad board is hereby given the power to fix and determine all interstate railroad rates and service, and also such intrastate rates and service as Congress has power to regulate under the Constitution of the United States. No State or State commission or other State authority shall fix, determine, or regulate any rates, service, or operation of railroads owned by any of said Federal railroad companies.

SEC. 16. That no stock shall be issued by any Federal railroad company except after the approval thereof by the Federal railroad board, which board shall also first approve the use to be made of such stock and the terms of its issue. All financial operations of every Federal railroad company shall be approved by the Federal railroad board before becoming effective.

SEC. 17. That if any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this act shall for any reason be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder of the act but shall be confined in its operation to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

SEC. 18. That all provisions of law inconsistent with or superseded by any of the provisions of this act are to that extent, and to that extent only, hereby repealed.

SEC. 19. That this act may be altered from time to time or repealed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I was intensely interested in the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT]. It suggested a new thought with respect to the organization and management and operation of railroads. I had intended, without having made any preparations, to give my views as to what should be done by the Congress in the matter of the organization of the railroads, in the matter of organization of merchant ships, as well as in the matter of the organization of the telegraph and the telephone and cable lines——

A MEMBER. Any more?

Mr. MADDEN. It is a big job, I hear some one say, and I do not pretend to have given it the kind of study that it merits. But I think the time is opportune for those who have opinions, or who think they have on what I consider these fundamental problems, to express their views, not with any intention of outlining definite legislation upon them, but rather for the purpose of inviting public discussion. For after all these questions must arrive at a stage before very long when definite and conclusive action must be taken upon them by the Congress of the United States. The people all over the United States are looking forward to the time when the Congress is to express a definite attitude. And while Members of the House and perhaps Members of the Senate are frequently reluctant to express their opinions in advance, lest they may not be in conformity with the public sentiment of the country, I think it well that some one should have the courage to have opinions and be willing to express them, regardless of whether they meet with the public view or not, in order that the discussion may go on and that something tangible may result from the discussion. And so I presume—for I assume that it is a presumption on my part, having no legal knowledge, having no special knowledge on either of these subjects—to assert an opinion.

But my opinion is that the railroad problem is of such transcendant importance that it must meet with some sort of satisfactory settlement before very long. It can not continue to remain under the control of the United States Government without either having money invested in it or having ownership in some form, for I apprehend that no one will claim that the Government has the right to maintain control over private property in times of peace while the owners of the property are held up in the air without any knowledge of what treatment their interest in the property is to receive; and so I have reached the conclusion that the owners of the property have rights which even the Government is bound to respect. For myself, I believe that the properties owned by the railroad companies of the United States can never go back into the same form of ownership which obtained before the war. Government operation has involved the expenditure of a large amount of Government money, and we have adopted a scheme of operation which, in effect, has set aside the Sherman law, and we have unified the railways. We have made the terminals common terminals. We have, in other words, pooled the issues of all the railroad companies merely by authorizing the President of the United States to take them over for operation during the war. We could have accomplished all this without the Government taking them over, but it might not have been considered wise, and perhaps it would not have been popular. To do without Government control during the war what we have done through Government control would involve the repeal of the Sherman law and would have permitted what has been claimed to be the basis of scientific management and operation of the railroads by men who have devoted all their lives to the practical solution of that problem. But, as it was, we did not have the courage or the good sense to do directly what we have done indirectly. We have had railroads under private ownership, with the rate-making power in the Interstate Commerce Commission. To the extent of the rate-making power and the accounting system we have had a measure of Government control. My judgment is that when this problem is finally settled it must be settled along lines that will unify the railroad systems of the country, and that this unification will involve the organization of a very strict Government regulation; that that regulation will be such as to give to the Government not only the power to make rates but to regulate the conduct of the operation of the roads, and also give to some board that may be created by the Congress the power to fix wages.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does not the gentleman believe that ought to be vested in the rate-making power?

Mr. MADDEN. The regulation may be covered all in one board. I do not undertake to say. I am giving just a rough outline of my own views for example.

In the consideration of this subject there are four general plans possible:

First. Government operation with private ownership (present condition).

Second. Government ownership and operation.

Third. Government ownership and private operation.

Fourth. Private ownership and operation with Government regulation.

To be satisfactory any plan must create the following fundamental conditions:

First. Confidence in the mind of the investor that the investments in railroad securities will be protected against improper methods of finance and lowering of rates below a reasonable level; that the principal and income will be secure. This is necessary because railroads must be improved and enlarged concurrently with the industrial growth and expanse of the country. Also the greater the stability in the railroad investments, the lower the interest rates at which money can be secured for railroad improvement and expansion. This interest cost of money is a substantial part of the cost of transportation, therefore a saving in this item will result in cheaper transportation. The truth of this statement has been proven by the events of the last 15 years. During this period, due to gradual undermining of the investor's confidence in railroad securities, funds for railroad development have been increasingly harder to secure and interest rates have advanced, consequently the railroads were practically standing still while the industrial life of the Nation was enormously expanding, with the inevitable result that when the peak load was reached the railroads were unequal to the task.

Second. Confidence on the part of the shipper that money received by the railroads for transportation will be properly used. The shipper first of all wants adequate service, and secondly he wants this service at the lowest consistent rate. However, he does not want service at less than cost, because later he will inevitably have to make up the deficit of to-day with an added penalty. The shipper will be willing to pay the necessary cost of adequate service economically produced. The confidence of the shipper has been undermined in the past, first by improper financial methods which placed unnecessary financial burdens on certain roads, and in other cases diversion of earnings which properly belonged in the properties. Secondly, many public agitators for personal reasons have taken advantage of these episodes to condemn the whole field of railroad endeavor, with the result that an atmosphere of suspicion and distrust has been cast over the whole railroad situation, even though, as a whole, we have the best and cheapest railroad transportation of any country in the world. No effort should be made to defend the improper practices, and attention is drawn to them only to point out the necessity of preventing their repetition.

Third. Confidence upon the part of railroad labor that it will receive a just compensation and that proper working conditions will be maintained. A workable method must be devised that will provide means of settling controversies, because strikes can not be tolerated as a means of settlement.

Fourth. Working conditions for the managements which will enable them to operate and develop the railroads along progressive lines. By this is meant that hampering restriction of laws, preventing pools, consolidations, and mergers, plural control by commissions, who ofttimes have different interests and no responsibility as to the general results of their acts, and restrictions in the funds allowed for maintenance and improvements should be eliminated.

Fifth. Confidence on the part of the general public that a square deal will be given; that the transportation agencies will be adequately developed along the right lines and economically operated, and that abuses will be prevented.

Taking up the possible plans and analyzing them with respect to the foregoing fundamentals, we arrive at the following conclusions:

GOVERNMENT OPERATION WITH PRIVATE OWNERSHIP (PRESENT PRACTICE).

This has the advantage that the railroads can be operated as a unit, are free from all restrictions, both Federal and State, and have the entire credit of the Nation behind the operation.

On the other hand this plan weakens instead of strengthening the credit of the owners, makes extensive improvements impossible, and produces a general unsettled and disturbed state.

Manifestly this method can not be permitted to continue for any prolonged period. The sooner it is discarded the sooner will settled conditions be established.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION.

This method will settle all questions relating to finances and to plural control, and would effect certain economies resulting from unified operation.

On the other hand it would be impossible to keep this enormous organization free from the effects of politics. The employees would use their political influence to force more favorable wages and working conditions; the various communities would use political influence to obtain improvements for their communities similar to the so-called "pork-barrel" method in appropriations for public improvements; and the constituents of officeholders would force the officeholders to make the railroads a job-hunting ground, with all the attendant evils resulting to the morale of the operating organization.

The railroads could not be operated economically, because the personal initiative and responsibility of the management would be entirely changed. Management can not be expressed in cut and dried formulas. It is the place where freedom of judgment must be allowed and personal initiative encouraged by fear of a penalty for failure and promise of reward for success. Government ownership and operation would stifle the morale of the railroad organizations. This morale is as important in business organizations as in an army on the firing line. It is harder to maintain than in an army, because it must be maintained continuously year in and year out, while in an army it is only for a relatively short period and under the stress of a great emergency.

Government operation would eventually become a huge imponderable machine tied up in the traditional red tape, entirely devoid of any personal element, either in its dealings with the public or its employees.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP AND PRIVATE OPERATION.

This method would solve the financial difficulties, but would be very close to Government ownership and operation and would have many of the objections of it. In addition, there would be the traditional troubles between landlord and tenant.

PRIVATE OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION WITH GOVERNMENT CONTROL.

This plan offers a way to attain the advantages of the other plans without the disadvantages, if properly worked out and fearlessly and constructively applied. Manifestly this control must be vested in one body, made up of our most experienced and able men. This body must be removed from all influences, both political and personal, other than the best interests of the whole country. The control body must also shoulder the responsibility for the success or failure of its control.

This body must be so organized that it will be easily accessible and will be in intimate touch with the various sections of the country, and will be capable of making prompt business-like decisions.

With the above in mind, it is suggested that the following things should be done:

First. All restrictions of present laws as to consolidations, pools, mergers, and so forth, should be repealed.

Second. Control should be centralized in the Federal Government.

Third. Create a commission whose organization, personnel, methods of doing business, powers, and responsibilities should be along the following general lines:

ORGANIZATION.

Divide the country into five regions, one to embrace New England with offices at Boston, one to embrace the eastern section with offices at New York, one to embrace the central section with offices at Chicago, one to embrace the West with offices at San Francisco, and the other to embrace the South with offices at Atlanta.

Each region to have a commission of five, who would handle all matters relating primarily to its own particular region.

For matters relating to the country as a whole, the five commissions would meet in Washington as a committee of the whole.

All the commissions to report to a director of transportation, whose duties would be entirely supervisory and who would determine questions of jurisdiction as between the regional committees and the committee of the whole. Each regional committee would have authority to render decisions as to matters brought before it or originated by it, and these decisions would be binding unless and until superseded by decisions of the committee of the whole. Methods of procedure should be left with the commission.

PERSONNEL.

Each regional committee should be made up of permanent residents of that particular region, and who should be required to live in that region during tenure of office.

The members of these committees should be appointed by the President, subject to approval of the Senate, under the same conditions as the Justices of the Supreme Court. The appointment to be for life or until reaching the age of 70.

Appointments should be made from men experienced in the following lines of endeavor:

1. Banking or investment.
2. Railroad management.

3. Commerce (representing the shippers).
4. Labor.
5. General (representing the general public).

Vacancies should be filled from the field from which the vacancies occurred.

POWER AND AUTHORITY.

These commissions should have the power and authority over the following things:

1. The issue of securities of all kinds, to prevent improper methods of finance.
2. Authority to approve or disapprove, or to order pools, mergers, and consolidations, with authority to approve, disapprove, or fix the terms thereof.
3. Authority to approve or disapprove or to order extensions and additions and betterments on all projects involving expenditures of more than $200,000 for each single project.
4. Supervision with authority to order corrections in the maintenance of the properties and charges made for depreciation, it being the duty of the commission to see that the properties are adequately maintained and adequate depreciation reserves set up to guarantee the integrity of the properties.
5. Supervision with authority to adjust working conditions and wages of railroad labor when agreements or settlements of controversies can not be reached by the employees and managements.
6. The power, authority, and responsibility of regulating service.
7. The power, authority, and responsibility of fixing rates.
8. Power and authority to approve or disapprove the dividends paid.
9. The authority to employ all necessary assistants.
10. Authority to prescribe methods of recording and accounting and reporting by the railroads.

In other words, the commissions would be given complete authority and power. The commissions would be made up of our best men experienced in the work and would then be responsible for the results.

Mr. GARNER. In the beginning the gentleman said we would not undertake to regulate property in which we had no interest. Now, if you adopt the scheme you suggest, do we not undertake to regulate the railroads in which the Government has no interest?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the Government must be said to have an interest, in the face of the fact that we have already expended a large amount of money for the development of the properties of the railroad companies during Government control, and for the interest which the Government has it may be necessary for us to have the power to regulate not only the rates but the wages; but, aside from that, the Government represents the people's interests, which must be taken into consideration.

Mr. GARNER. But I understood the gentleman in the beginning to say that fundamentally it was wrong for the Government of the United States to take property and undertake to regulate it when it had no financial interest in it. Let me direct the attention of the gentleman to the fact that under the condition that existed before the war the Interstate Commerce Commission was undertaking to regulate the freight rates of the country and certain other phases of the railroads, and under the gentleman's scheme it would be just an enlargement of their powers over properties which, if I understand the gentleman, are still to be owned by the individuals.

Mr. MADDEN. The Government is doing to-day what I said I objected to, but will not be permitted to do when we finally reach an adjustment and turn the roads back.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I would prefer to go on.

Mr. IGOE. Go ahead.

Mr. MADDEN. I think we ought to have regional boards of directors. I think that on these regional boards there ought to be men representing all the elements of activity within the region. I think labor should be represented, I think agriculture should be represented, I think banking and manufactures should be represented, and when we reorganize the roads, in my judgment, the men who are selected as members of a regional board should be men who live within the territory for which they are selected, and if they have the qualifications that they should have they should be appointed to these positions for life, so that they would be taken away from the political influences that might shape their actions if they were appointed only at the will of the President or some other public functionary. Personally I am against Government ownership, but I am in favor of the strictest Government regulation consonant with proper conduct of these great arteries of commerce. I believe in stabilizing, I believe in unifying, I believe in utilizing the instrumentalities of commerce to the full limit of their power. I believe that if we unify and permit the use of the terminals in common and permit the pooling, so to speak, of the issues, of the incomes, and the traffic under proper Government regulation we will not only be able to treat labor fairly but we will also be able to treat capital fairly and that we will have a condition of things which will meet with the approval of the American people.

After all, whatever settlement of the question is made, it must be made with a view to meeting the approval of the people, because they are the greatest factor in the case.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. I would be glad to get the gentleman's reasons why he favors regional control.

Mr. MADDEN. Because I think the conditions are different in different sections of the country and require different treatment. For example, in a strictly agricultural territory the conditions are totally different from what they are in a strictly manufacturing territory. I think the conditions are different in a strictly agricultural territory from what they are in great centers of population. I think they are different in the mountain territory from what they are in the prairie territory, and I believe men acting as regional directors within the different zones will have a better conception of the needs of the community over which they preside than they would have if they were selected entirely from New York or Chicago or some other great center of population.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman says, in argument for the regional control, that there are different conditions in different sections of the country. Take it within one of the regions—I care not how large or how small—will you not have poor railroads and rich railroads?

Mr. MADDEN. We would have one system of railroads, in my judgment, if we are going to meet this case as it ought to be met. We will not have any rich or poor railroads, but we will have whatever they are, rich or poor. We will have one system.

Mr. DENISON. Then should competition be entirely eliminated?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; entirely eliminated, if you want to put it in that way. I would eliminate it to the extent that the Government permits its elimination. I am not afraid to eliminate competition if the Government regulates it. That is the point.

Mr. DENISON. If you eliminate competition entirely and private initiative in the management of railroads——

Mr. MADDEN. I am not eliminating private initiative in the management of ralroads.

Mr. DENISON. Why not as soon have Government ownership?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not eliminating private initiative; I am encouraging it.

Mr. DENISON. But you can not have private initiative if there is no competition.

Mr. MADDEN. There will be competition between the railroads. They will use the roads in common, and if the Government is to regulate with the rigidity I think it can there will be no trouble either about the initiative or about the competition.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Does the gentleman believe that the ownership of the roads should remain private?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and the operation of them.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. But that the directors of the road who should control it should be appointed by some other agency?

Mr. MADDEN. I did not say the directors of the road; I was talking about the regional regulating directors.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Regulating what?

Mr. MADDEN. Regulating the conduct of the railroads, the issuance of stocks and bonds, the finances, and doing the things that ought to be done to prevent the owners from putting on the market spurious securities.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. And also regulate the rates?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Then what would be left of the owners of the roads?

Mr. MADDEN. The scientific management of the business. I maintain that the man who manages the practical side of a business is infinitely more in need of scientific knowledge than the man who is charged with the responsibility of regulating his action.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. But if you regulate and determine his income and his expenses, what scientific financial expertness can benefit the owner of the road?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman is assuming now that we are attempting to pass a law, while I am only outlining my views, and I think the gentleman is taking a too restricted view of what I say.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I was asking for information, in order to learn what the regional directors would be permitted to do, what powers they would have.

Mr. MADDEN. The railroad directors, the managers of the railroads, would be permitted to run the roads, to regulate the employment of men, to make the schedules of trains, to regulate every part of business of the institution, except the issuance of securities, the making of the rates, and the regulation of the conditions that will be laid down by the law, through the regional directors. The manager of the railroad would be the man who would need knowledge, brains, and experience. The other men, the regional directors, need nothing except a knowledge of how to carry out the law that is laid down, within the strict lines of which they must act. But the railroad man, the manager, the man with scientific knowledge, will have to have knowledge extending throughout the ramifications of the railroad business. He will have to coordinate, he will have to manage, he will have to provide, he will have to buy, build, and supply the equipment, and he will have to know how to schedule his trains, he will have to know what connections to make here, there, and everywhere. This is something that requires scientific knowledge. The other is simply a knowledge that will be laid down for the men between the lines of the law.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The Federal Reserve Board can regulate the rates of interest that a bank can charge, but the Federal Reserve Board does not supersede the owners of the bank. The owners do the business of the bank just the same as before.

Mr. MADDEN. Why, certainly.

Mr. FESS. As I understand your plan would be an opportunity which would give regulation, but the owners of the road would run the road just as the owners of a bank run the bank?

Mr. MADDEN. Just as the owner of the plow runs the plow, exactly. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I want to get away from this and start on something else. I do not say that I want to get away because I am not anxious to answer the gentleman, but my time is limited.

A MEMBER. The gentleman is getting into deep water.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I am not getting into deep water; I am willing to swim in any water there is. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman says when he gets these regions established, of which he talks about, this Utopia, there will not be any rich roads or poor roads, and yet he says he believes in private ownership——

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Is he going to carry his structure to that point where every stockholder will be paid the same return upon his investment regardless of what kind of a road his money is in?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the regional directors ought to coordinate with the main board at Washington. This board will be a subsidiary body of the main board, and they will be under the direction of the main body exactly as the regional directors of the Reserve Bank System are under the Reserve Board, exactly. Of course, you know you can not outline a bill here in an ordinary 30 minutes' talk. It is very easy for a man to rise in his place and ask questions that have no relation whatever to the subject. I stated when I arose that I only rose for the purpose of creating discussion on the outside, and I hope whatever I may say here to-day will create discussion that will result in some concrete legislation.

Mr. RAYBURN. If this talk gets out it will create some discussion on the outside.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. I simply desire to ask my colleague if I have not understood him correctly, that he favors one great central corporation of railroads rather than the regional proposition submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MADDEN. I am in favor of one great corporation authorized by the Government of the United States to cover the whole United States.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman permit one other question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. In the gentleman's judgment, with the study he has given to this question, does not he believe that the administration of a zone system when applied to railroads that extend entirely across the country will be an impossibility?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, no; I think not. I think that certain jurisdiction could be given to the regional directors by the Federal board that will give them the jurisdiction within the division as it is to-day under private ownership. Under private ownership the managing director of a railroad company appoints a division superintendent, and within the division the superintendent is supreme.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The regional plan would not necessarily be divided upon the basis of geography?

Mr. MADDEN. Not at all.

Mr. FESS. It would follow the thoroughfare?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely. There is one more thing I was going to say.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa rose.

Mr. MADDEN. I can not dwell upon this any longer, because I intended to take up the ship proposition. I realize, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that this is a big topic, and it is one that can not be dealt with offhand or it can not be dealt with in a jocular way, as you gentlemen have attempted to deal with it. Of course it does not make any difference how you joke with me about it. You know you can not take me off my feet, and it will not embarrass me, no matter what you say; and whether I have thrown any light upon the subject does not matter. I have expressed the opinion that I have crudely formed. I would perhaps have expressed that much better if you gentlemen had let me alone. [Laughter.]

Now I desire to take up the shipping question. Since the war began we have built a very large number of ships. We have built those ships at an enormous cost. Those ships are owned by the Government of the United States. It must be evident to everybody who has given any thought to the question that the Government can not itself engage in the shipping business in competition with the shipping of the world. Something will have to be done when this war is over to utilize the great merchant marine which we have accumulated and of which we are all so proud in order that we may be able to meet the competition of England, France, and the other nations in the markets of the world.

Mr. FESS. Before the gentleman leaves that point, will he yield for one question?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion on Mr. Hurley's statement that on account of the grade of efficiency on the part of American labor we will be able to meet that competition.

Mr. MADDEN. There can not be anyone who has given an hour's thought to the question of efficiency in labor who will agree that Mr. Hurley is right, not that our men are not efficient, but we are paying very much more money than any other nation pays to the men who are following a seafaring life. For example, Japan pays on an average about $15 a month to its sailors, England pays about $30 a month, and America about $60 a month. Now, there must be something done in the matter of legislation to equalize this situation so that we can successfully compete with the shipping of the world, and I have a suggestion to make which you men may not think to be wise or to be practicable. I think, first, that we must either sell or lease the ships that the Government has built if we expect to maintain the supremacy which these ships should give to the United States in the markets of the world. Whether it will be by sale or lease is a matter for the Congress to determine. Then the question, if we sell, is, How are we going to encourage the men who buy to operate the ships at a profit?

If we lease, what are to be the terms of the lease? And how can the man who leases our ships afford to fly the American flag if he is compelled to pay $60 to a sailor in competition with Japan, who pays $15? How can he afford to operate the ships, and can he operate the ships successfully and profitably—and the two are together—if he has to compete with England, who pays her men $30 a month? The natural logic of the situation might suggest a subsidy to pay the man who leases the boat or ship for his loss. That would not be popular, and never has been popular, in the minds of the American people.

Then, what is the necessary thing to do? Are we going to draw on the Treasury of the United States to make up the deficit, and are we going to hand the amount that we draw from the Treasury over to the man who leases the ship? That is not a popular thought, because in the mind of the ordinary man every man who is transacting business is making a lot of money, though he may be losing it. Most people say that no man will run business at a loss; but I have seen business run for several years at a loss. And I have been asked why. It was because those who owned it were trying to hold on until they could see a chance for a profit. They had their money invested; it was all they had in the world. What were they to do with it? Throw it away without an effort? Of course not. Most men who have hung on under adverse circumstances and have had the courage to meet the situation as it was have won out in the end. Now, we have this situation to meet: We have the opposition of the American people to a ship subsidy. It does not sound well to the average American. Then, what are we going to do?

I have this suggestion to make: If we pay $60 and Japan pays $15 and England pays $30, we can have a board appointed, through which board we can pay out of the Treasury of the United States the difference in wages paid by England and Japan and the wages paid to the American sailor. When you pay it direct to the sailor, there will be no opposition to it, because everybody knows he is not getting it to make him rich.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. That brings up the old problem. As an economic proposition, how is England to compete with Japan if it costs them 50 per cent more?

Mr. MADDEN. Every shipper in England takes stock in the shipping company in proportion to the size of his business—does it as part of a voluntary plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have perhaps 5, or maybe 10, minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. Does that interest equal the difference in the cost between Japan and England?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; it does, as both owner and shipper meet the loss in proportion to their interest.

Mr. GARNER. Our cost, then, would be equal to, say, $35 per man as between Japan and this country, and if Japan went down——

Mr. MADDEN. Equal to $45.

Mr. GARNER. And if Japan went down to $12 we would have to increase it to $48, and if it went down to $10 we would have to increase it to $50.

Mr. MADDEN. And my idea is that if we have an opportunity we will pay this to the men themselves.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the English Government pay a subsidy to their freighters?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] can answer that more correctly than I can.

Mr. EDMONDS. They do not pay it to freighters or to tramps. But they do pay it to passenger and package steamers.

Mr. MADDEN. We will have to do it if we are going to maintain the standard of wages.

Mr. GARNER. How are you going to ship freight from England in competition with Japan with only 50 per cent of the cost, maybe, that we can do the work with?

Mr. MADDEN. Maybe we can. I am in favor of establishing a board through which we can pay to the men who sail under the American flag the difference between the wages paid here and the wages paid in other places.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am interested in what you are saying, and I want to ask you this one question in regard to your proposition. The wages of the American seamen are fixed, as I understand it, by the Seamen's Union?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. And in these other cases they do not have such regulation. Now, if we would adopt such a plan as you suggest, what difference would it make to the shipowner or the Government running a ship if they could fix any price for their labor and it would be paid out of the Treasury?

Mr. MADDEN. We have got to assume that we are going to be reasonable and our labor unions are not going to make it impossible for the American flag to fly on the world's seas.

Mr. GARNER. From the gentleman's experience with the Post Office Department, he ought to be convinced at this time that those wages are going up.

Mr. MADDEN. Whatever it is, whatever it may be in the future, we must meet it if we expect to run American ships. I think that is the way to deal with it, and I believe if we deal with it in any such fashion as that we will be able to float the American flag on every American merchant ship that has been made in every American shipyard and will be able to meet the competition in the markets of the world.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Your proposition in effect is a subsidy, after all, is it not?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; of course it is a subsidy, but it is the kind of a subsidy that the people would agree to.

Mr. KEARNS. You only call it by another name so that they will not object to it?

Mr. MADDEN. No. I do not think the people themselves object to a subsidy in fact if it is paid to somebody who needs the money rather than to the man to add to his profits.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. A few years ago, before the war broke out in Europe, when we were in normal peace times, I heard Capt. Dollar say that a ship that cost here pretty nearly a million dollars—close to a million—which was an ordinary freighter—I think it was about 7,000 tons or maybe 10,000 tons—could be bought abroad for $500,000, according to my recollection.

Mr. MADDEN. I think he said $600,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes. Now, that is true. You can buy a ship abroad—a Japanese can get a ship at $500,000, or an Englishman can do it, and it costs $900,000 or $1,000,000 to buy the same ship here. How would the gentleman undertake to compete?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. We are up against that situation. We already have a certain number of ships that we have built. The cost of building a ton of shipping before the war was about $75 for a wooden ship, and to-day it is $200. But we have the ships, and we must make some disposition of them, and we want to use them in the markets of the world, and we must provide some method by which they can be used. We constantly boast of American genius, of its ability to overcome obstacles. Our people continue to insist that we can do what other people can do. They want an active American merchant marine. If they insist upon having American ships, built in American yards, operated by American sailors, under the American flag, at American wages, they will doubtless sustain us in our efforts to meet their views if we can but develop American commerce on the high seas.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks permission to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. America's answer to the poem "In Flanders Fields":

Rest ye in peace, ye Flanders dead.
The fight that ye so bravely led We've taken up. And we will keep True faith with you who lie asleep
With each a cross to mark his bed,
And poppies blooming overhead,
Where once his own lifeblood ran red.
So let your rest be sweet and deep
In Flanders fields.

Fear not that ye have died for naught.
The torch ye threw to us we caught.
Ten million hands will hold it high,
And freedom's light shall never die!
We've learned the lesson that ye taught
In Flanders fields.

Your flaming torch aloft we bear,
With burning heart our oath we swear
To keep the faith, to fight it through
To crush the foe or sleep with you
In Flanders fields.

And our boys kept the faith and fought it through! [Applause.] On this winter's day, on the eve of a new era in world politics, when the implements of warfare are already rusting upon battle fields but yesterday the scene of awful carnage, we give our heartfelt thanks for the blessings of peace—blessings achieved in large measure by the matchless courage and the superb bravery of our own boys and by the unflinching spirit of devotion and determination of our people at home. [Applause.] Each week welcomes back tens of thousands of our boys in khaki and in blue, and we say to them each one, and we say also to every man who did not have the opportunity of going abroad: "We appreciate what you have done and the country thanks you for your heroic deeds. For all time you men in blue and you men in khaki have earned the gratitude of your country for your unselfish sacrifice in maintaining the principles of our Nation and the honor and the glory of the flag." [Applause.]

In the brief time allotted me to-day I desire to speak of some of the things I saw on the firing line last summer and a year ago. I regret that opportunity does not permit me to speak fully of the achievements of Great Britain in this conflict; but let me say that the men of English blood and of Scotch and of Irish and of Welsh blood and the men from the colonies overseas fought in this conflict like the bulldogs which they are, and that the people of that great empire gave of their substance and of their blood without stint and without reserve. [Applause.] And of France—heroic, noble France, bearing in this conflict the greatest blows in the history of war; France, our friend and ally in the dark days of our Revolution—think for a moment of what France has done in this great struggle! One million four hundred thousand of her sons dead; 1,400,000 more helpless cripples; thousands and thousands of her women and children victims of the savagery of war; scores of her cities shapeless ruins; hundred of acres of her rich land desolate waste; homes destroyed, churches demolished; and yet the resolution of France rose supreme to the sacrifices, the horrors, and the losses, and through the weary years of darkness stood steadfast between Prussia and her ambition to rule the world. [Applause.]

They say "France was bled white." Yes, in men and in money, but not in spirit and in heroism; and the blood that was shed by those French soldiers on the last day of the fight was the reddest of the red blood of heroes. Bleeding and maimed as she was, France through it all gave a promise like the rainbow in the heavens that democracy was safe in her hands. [Applause.]

I want to take you a moment, my colleagues, to the battle line. We will go to the city of Rheims, the city which of all cities appeals to us for sympathy. It was in November a year ago, just as the lengthening twilight of a gray November afternoon was casting its somber hues on those torn and gloomy walls that we entered the city of Rheims. Rheims, ill-fated, battle-scarred Rheims! What memories and associations of the past, what tragedies and sorrows of the present, are awakened at the sound of that name! Religion, history, art, chivalry, romance—the epitome of human aspirations and of human endeavors—crowd the centuries of her existence. To-day empty homes, crowded cemeteries, desecrated churches, crumbled walls, and battered pavements tell of the bombardment and the destruction wrought by German guns. And there, surmounting all, a pathetic monument to the frightfulness and wreckage of war, stands the shattered cathedral. For 800 years this masterpiece of architectural splendor has been the shrine of countless thousands. But yesterday the pride of France, to-day a bleak and broken relic of its former glory. Birds flight their passage through those empty windows, once studded with the noblest expression of the glazier's art. Molded column and chiseled art, rich with the tracings of a master hand, lie as heaps of dirt upon the pavement. And there in front of the altar, where once stood Joan of Arc when her King was crowned, is a great pile of broken glass and fragments of holy figures. Oh, the pathos and the wantonness of it all!

And I want to take you with me for a moment to the heights of the Meuse on the eastern frontier of France, to Verdun, immortal Verdun, the rock of destiny! [Applause.] Verdun, against whose slopes were hurled the mightiest assaults that the world has ever known; Verdun, whose very hills were blasted to their base beneath the heaviest cannonading in all history; Verdun, a name which will endure for the ages; Verdun, where the blood of heroes was transmuted into everlasting glory! Go out on those hills which surround the city like a necklace, 35 miles in extent. Down in those valleys and on the hills beyond, and yet beyond, was fought that great fight of two years ago. Square mile after square mile, with not an inch that has not been torn by shell and consecrated by the supreme sacrifice of those who fell in its defense. It is as if nature herself had sickened at the terrible carnage being wrought on her bosom and died in the agonies of smallpox leaving its mark upon every hand. Shell hole and crater, crater and shell hole, crowd there one upon the other in terrible confusion, and those holes to-day are filled with pieces of artillery, rifles, hand grenades, helmets, gas masks; yes, dead men, too, are lying there in the mud at Verdun! I have seen the ruins of Port Arthur in Manchuria, and have been to the top of 303 Meter Hill, where the Russians and Japanese crossed swords in 1904; but all the devastation and ruin of Port Arthur is not one-tenth of what we saw at Verdun. We passed three cemeteries containing 30,000 men, and I asked the commandant, "Where lie the rest?"

"There they lie beneath your feet, ground back into the elements." Three hundred thousand men gave up their lives in this inferno of death; 180,000 Germans, 120,000 French; five men killed for every 9 square feet of earth on those blood-soaked fields. Oh, remember what happened at Verdun. Line after line of Germans in that terrific onslaught poured up those slopes to be beaten back time and time by the French soldiers. Fort Douaumont had fallen, and the German lines were only 4 miles from the city. Then the Kaiser, watching the battle, telegraphed to Berlin that he held the key to Verdun, and the capital decorated itself with flags and bunting in anticipation of a victorious march to Paris. But between those gray German lines and their goal stood the intrepid soldiers of France! True to the traditions of their glorious past, they met charge with charge, attack with attack, bayonet with bayonet, club with club, stayed the avalanche which had piled the ground in places with 9 feet of human corpses, and held on; and the victory flags of Berlin, tattered and torn by waiting, became shrouds on the coffin of the Kaiser's dream of conquest. [Applause.] And to-day Verdun, with all the blood and all the anguish that it represents, stands forth as the greatest monument to courage and bravery in all the world, and it stands there, too, as the sepulchre of Prussian hopes and ambitions. [Applause.] Oh, my colleagues, think of what transpired there at Verdun and what hung in the balance. It was here that civilization itself tottered, then fell as the German hosts swept onward, then rose again as the dauntless soldiers of France, inspired by the watchword of liberty, "They shall not pass," drove back again and yet again the onslaught of the Huns. [Applause.] Let me tell of what we saw in one of our great training camps in France a year ago. Do you know that some of your own sons have been arrested as deserters from the American Army? Our own boys have been arrested for leaving their colors; and I will tell you why. Many of those boys in khaki were stationed back of the line, in the south of France and at the seaports, and, despairing of a chance to go to the trenches, they deserted; and when they were found they were on the firing line with rifles in their hands, fighting with their victorious comrades. [Applause.]

But to return to the training camps. We went to one a year ago and saw those boys of ours coming in from their training. I said, "Boys, how are you?" They said, "All right." "How is your food?" "All right," they replied. "How are your quarters?" "We are not kicking." "How is your equipment?" "Oh, we are satisfied." I said, "Well, now, boys, haven't you any kick at all to make? Remember, I am a Congressman, and if I do not get a few kicks once in a while it does not seem natural. Now, let me have your complaints, if you have any." And they gathered around me, not one but dozens, and this was their trouble: "Our complaint is that we can't get to the front. For God's sake give us a chance to fight before this war is over." [Applause.] That is all the complaint our boys had.

I want to tell you some of the things about our boys and what they have done—some personal things. Oh, we came into this fight not one minute too soon. Last March the Germans started that great offensive, the objective being to break in two the allied armies and seize Paris and Amiens while yet America was preparing. They launched that terrific line of fire, a line that left in its wake ruin, desolation, death, outrage, pillage, rape; a line of fire that trampled under foot every precept of law, every right of Christianity and of humanity; a line of fire as if the very flood gates of hell had broken loose. That line crept farther and farther southward. You and I recall how we would go out there in the lobby day after day and watch that thin line of defense on the great map being pushed nearer and nearer toward Paris. What was the answer to it all? Oh, there was only one. America in all her faith and strength answered the call and hurled into the vortex 2,000,000 of her sterling manhood, with 5,000,000 more to follow if it had been necessary. [Applause.] Then those Germans, sweeping on day after day, with every day a victory, came against a stone wall. They thought when they saw those old slouch hats and those khaki uniforms that the stone wall was made of Australians and Canadians, and it was an honor to be taken for an Australian or Canadian on that firing line. [Applause.]

They sent back for more artillery; they sent back for their reserves; they sent back for their Prussian Guard; and they stormed and stormed that stone wall, but it did not give way, for those slouch hats belonged to the boys from the States, the American devils. [Applause.] You know you have to take account of every piece of information you pick up. One day up there on the line we came across 10 German soldiers lying in a circle not larger than this hall. We went through their pockets to see if they had any information which would be of benefit to our own lines. We found nothing, but in front of Chateau-Thierry an American officer discovered the diary of a German officer, and this is how it read:

July 11. Things are going fine. We will soon be in Paris.
July 13. The fighting is becoming furious.
July 14. We have sent back for our reserves, and we are fighting like hell.
July 15. Mein Gott! How those Americans can fight.

[Applause.]

I want to say a word or two about little Belgium. Belgium restored once more, thank God, to her own boundaries and to her own people! [Applause.] When we were in Belgium the part free from the invader was only 30 miles long and 15 miles wide. If that flag behind the Speaker was a map of Europe, those of you in the rear seats would not be able to discern the part which was free Belgium. We went there, as my friends, GOODWIN, DALE, and TIMBERLAKE, will remember, on the birthday of the King. We were not dressed in court attire; we had on trench shoes and old trousers covered with mud and slime, flannel shirts, and old slouch hats. The King welcomed us in that great democratic simplicity which has endeared him to the world. We told him that America was proud of what the Belgians had done, and he replied, "Here I am in the little remnant of my Kingdom, and here I will remain until every Belgian is killed and until Belgium is no more." [Applause.] We told him that the American people thought a great deal of him and of his people, and I asked him what message I could take home with me to America. Putting his hand on my shoulder, he said, "Take this message to the American people," and I give it to you to-day from the heroic King of the Belgians:

"Tell the American people that without their help and their support my people would have starved to death, and from the bottom of my heart I thank them." [Applause.]

Let me tell you some stories, some deeds, of those boys of ours. Let me give you some of their actual experiences. Up there on the front at the Vesle River we met some of the officers who had been out in no man's land with their men. There was an Irishman from my own State, and one night an officer going over the top discovered this young lad going forward with a revolver in his hand. The officer said, "Here, Mike, put up that pistol; that is not heavy enough. Use your rifle in this kind of a fight." The Irishman said, "Officer, I can't do it; I am wounded." "Wounded; whereabouts?" "In my stomach." And the officer looked and saw that a machine-gun bullet had ripped up the man's stomach, and he was holding his intestines in with his left hand, but he was going toward the enemy, fighting with his right hand. [Applause.]

Let me tell you another story. One night a man was found crawling on his stomach through that shell-infested area, and an officer coming upon him said, "Stand up." The man replied that he could not, that he was wounded. "If you are wounded, you want to crawl the other way, because you are crawling toward the enemy." "Yes; I know it, but I am going that way because I know that right up there is a German machine-gun nest, and I am going after it." That man gave his life's last blood fighting the enemy of his country. [Applause.]

Now, do you wonder why it was that Bulgaria gave up? Do you wonder why it was that Austria cried, "Kammarad"? Do you wonder why it was that the Imperial German Army crumbled and then ran for home and have been running ever since? Do you wonder now why it was that the German Government when they asked for peace found themselves in pieces? Do you wonder now why it was that a great navy hauled down its flag without striking a blow? Do you wonder now why it was that the German Kaiser deserted his people and fled to Holland, and lies in hiding, wrathfully contemplating the smash up of the divine right of kings and the dissolution of that nefarious compact between "Me und Gott"? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, on this winter's day, somewhere in the Valley of the Rhine, somewhere in Alsace-Lorraine, somewhere in northern France, the Stars and Stripes are flying. They are kissed by the golden sunbeams, messengers from on high, in the effulgent light of victory for God, for civilization, and for country. They fly in the triumph of a holy cause, glorified in their rededication to the cause of human rights. [Applause.] Let us remember on this day what St. Paul said 2,000 years ago; when we behold our flag flying there in triumph, let us remember his words in those days of long ago. Facing the angry mob, which beset him, he said, "Beware how you molest me, for I am a citizen of Rome."

He epitomized in that declaration the power and the determination of that great Empire of antiquity whose protecting arm stretched to the ends of the earth. To-day the American flag, the symbol of the unity, the purpose, and the will of a mighty people, proclaims to all the world the admonition, Beware how you molest him who renders me allegiance, for he is a citizen of America. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. How much time did the gentleman yield back?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the House was very much interested to-day when the minority leader, Mr. MANN, discussed the failure of our soldiers abroad to get their mail. I have with me a short article which states that Assistant Secretary Praeger told the Senate Committee on Post Offices on January 11 that from 8 to 10 carloads of mail are now standing on the tracks in one place in France undistributed. Secretary Praeger, of the Post Office Department, laid the blame for this tragic mismanagement directly upon the War Department. Probably millions of undelivered letters have failed to reach our boys in Europe through this criminal carelessness. Responsible officers should be court-martialed for such neglect, because it violates every pledge given that we would look after the boys properly. Let me say, I have not heard from my own son, somewhere in France or Germany in times of peace, now for two months. Other parents have not heard from their sons for several months. Who is responsible for this neglect and what punishment is to be given them? The wives, parents, and other relatives who have boys abroad are anxious and every Member here should take it unto himself to force a reply and determine where the responsibility rests. Will we do it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Did the gentleman say tons or carloads?

Mr. FREAR. Carloads; 8 or 10 carloads of undelivered mail in one place. I have another matter I desire to present. I am receiving hundreds of letters, like every other Member of Congress to-day, asking that soldier boys be brought home from the cantonments and camps. Let me read two or three letters that carry their own message. However small or uninfluential may be the individual Congressman, they will be obliged eventually to listen to us at the War Department if we bring our voices together in an emphatic demand, because we have the final determination. Congress gave the War Department every facility with which to carry on this war. Sooner or later that department must make an accounting, and we ought to hold the Army staff or responsible officers strictly accountable for conditions such as are now disclosed. I received the following from Camp Hancock several days ago. I can not give the boy's name, but he is from my home State and writes from this Georgia camp.

He writes:

Start a movement to get these boys in camp home. There are thousands of men and almost every family interested. Here is a camp that costs the Government something well over a hundred thousand dollars a day to maintain, yet demobilization plans have not taken a good step forward. What are they waiting for—until the cold, cold winter weather steps in and then transfer the northern boys north? In this way many will undoubtedly die.

However, it appears the mayor of Augusta still has influence at Washington, despite his practical admission of being implicated in camp-contract scandals.

I do not assume responsibility for that statement; I give it as it comes to me, but I do know that such influences are sometimes urged to keep boys in local camps.

He continues:

Some of the soldiers are of the opinion that his frequent trips to Washington are for the purpose of keeping the camp here as long as possible. The boys from the North need champions—see that we get a square deal. Every week in the Army costs some of us $60.

Now, I will read from another letter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I can not, because my time is limited. Here is another letter relating to another camp in Georgia, Camp Jessup. It comes from the father of a boy, who writes me from Wisconsin. He asks why his boy can not be released. The father writes:

Received a letter from my son to-day, that an order was issued at his camp that no application for discharge was to be accepted, and states that he thinks the only thing to do to get a discharge is to take it up with the head of the Motor Transport Corps, at Washington.

Why can not our boys be discharged from these Georgia camps? Who issued that order refusing to discharge, and why?

I have another letter, a third, also from Georgia, this time coming from Camp Gordon. I prefer not to give the name, but the writer, an officer of the camp, says:

The commanding officer of this organization can fully appreciate the conditions as outlined in your letter, but no orders have been received to discharge the men now in this depot. As soon as such order has been received this man will be given consideration. Under the circumstances nothing can be done at the present time toward relieving him of duty at this depot.

Here are three letters coming from three camps in one State—Georgia—and men can not get released from their enforced service. They are not drilling nor working, just idling, and they all want to go home.

Why does the War Department hold them there?

In a letter received from Wisconsin, the cashier of a bank writes me regarding his wife's brother, who served with the One hundred and twenty-eighth Infantry. He writes:

My wife's brother was wounded about July 20, near Soissons, in France. His parents, at Menomonie, Wis., never received any notice from the War Department, and the first word finally came in a letter from him. On December 9 he arrived at Hoboken, N. J., and has been confined to his bed for over five months. During that time he has had three operations on his leg and will have to have another to save it. During all this time he has not received any mail, though his sisters have written him every week. A draft for $15 sent him in France also failed to reach him. He has not been paid a cent since June. When he arrived at Hoboken he sold his shirt to get money for cutting four months' growth of hair. In a letter received to-day (Dec. 21) he states he is to be sent to Fort Snelling.

These letters are from or concerning boys from my home State who were taken from their homes sometimes with only a few hours' notice, and this is the treatment given by the War Department. I am not giving trivial complaints. These boys might as well be in prison pens as unemployed in southern camps. In the last case what treatment could be more brutal than to leave this wounded boy without a cent for six months and no letters or money ever reached him. In fact, he sold his shirt to get money to look human and have his hair cut. Many court-martials are in order, and the men to be tried for neglect are those who wear shoulder straps and are responsible for such treatment as these boys receive.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] has just spoken of the arrogance of Regular Army officers. Let me read from another letter that confirms his statement.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. In a moment I will be glad to do so. This is from a man, a brave officer who fought at Chateau-Thierry. I know him intimately and have known him for many years. He was over there in the hot fighting with the Wisconsin National Guard Division. He has been sent to a camp in this country. He writes of his present duties:

A general court-martial is held (I have sat on many of them) and some badly frightened youngster is brought in, and according to the accusations by the judge advocate, who is picked from among the lawyer officers, the lad is a notorious criminal. Upon cross-examination it seems that the lad has been in the service, we'll say, a year, having been drafted. He has asked for a pass only to be refused, receives a pitiful letter from his sister that their mother has become dangerously ill and there are doubts as to her recovery, and she wants to see her boy. He again applies for a pass and is told that the full number has gone and he is turned down. He calmly gets out of camp and goes to his home to see his mother. After a couple of days he suddenly realizes what he has done and becomes frightened and is afraid to go back. He remains in the house with his uniform on but not daring to go out. A detective places him under arrest and he is brought back to camp and to the guardhouse. The testimony is finished and court closed. The court solemnly decides that the boy is guilty of deliberate desertion in time of war; in fact, their minds are usually made up in advance. The boy has been defended by some lieutenant, who has agreed to handle the case and who laughingly says after the case is over, "Oh, I told the lad to plead guilty and throw himself on the mercy (?) of the court, because I don't know anything about the case." What shall the sentence be? After strong protest by one member of the court, the lad is sentenced to "dishonorable discharge" and 15 years at Fort Leavenworth.

I have described an actual case, being a member of the court myself.

Thank God, I was in the National Guard, who did the fighting over in France while the Regular Army stayed over on this side, filling the prisons with homesick boys.

What have you to say of such treatment of boys we have taken from their homes by the strong arm of the law in order to give up their lives, if need be, for their country? A few understrapping officers who never saw real service, but who sat in solemn judgment over this kid soldier that went home to see his sick mother, these officers who would Prussianize this country by such methods, sent that boy to Leavenworth for 15 years. Is it not time that Congress takes cognizance of such matters? Every man who sat on that court-martial and who voted to railroad that boy into Leavenworth should himself be court-martialed and imprisoned, if these facts appear as stated. I have served many years in the Regular Army and National Guard myself and have a wholesome respect for discipline, but these little martinets blessed with a brief authority are trying to out-Prussianize Prussia.

I have not discussed scores of complaints received against the War Risk Bureau, casualty division, allotment branch, or other recognized inefficiency in the past. These mistakes or neglect have caused much suffering in individual cases; but I am trying to place before the House matters that should receive certain and immediate attention.

Mr. Chairman, with the state of affairs I have described, with carloads—yes, trainloads—of mail undelivered to our soldier boys in France, with no pay in many cases for months at a time, with the disgraceful showing at Brest, where 70,000 boys were forced to sleep and live in rain and mud, with the scandalous conditions described in letters read to us by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], with a widely published statement by Gov. Henry J. Allen a day or so ago that our troops fought for four days in Argonne Forest without artillery support, suffering casualties of one-half of the division, that were concealed by a rigid censorship as absolute as that of Germany but "lacking only the German intelligence," with courts-martial here at home of boys sent to Leavenworth for long terms because absent without leave from camps in this country after the war was over, with hundreds of thousands of boys unable to get out of southern camps, I say what indictment can be laid against any department stronger than that?

We are a patriotic people, and we have been fighting to maintain democracy and bestow it upon other peoples. What can we say of the facts that are given by Members on this floor day after day in view of our avowed purposes?

Members sit here helplessly, and no one has suggested a remedy. I am willing to overlook many shortcomings during times of war, but now that the war is over I believe those responsible for wrong conditions should be punished, no matter where it hits. Unless demobilization proceeds in southern camps without delay we should investigate conditions and do more than idle resoluting when responsibility is fixed.

Why do we sit here helpless? We represent these boys and their wives and parents. The letters are filed with the testimony of the men, and they ask for relief.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Wisconsin ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield one additional minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question based on this situation: A young man, formerly of rank in the National Guard, under the impulse of war, enlisted. He has made no effort to get any rank. He left a good salary in this city. I called on the general to know what he was doing and why he could not be discharged. The reply came to me that in order to discharge him they would have to state they did not need him. Therefore, later on, they could not find anybody to take his place. He is doing clerical work that a boy could do without any training. Here is a man of good salary, identified with some of the Members here, of rank in the National Guard, who seems to be held simply to save the ranks of others.

Mr. FREAR. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, in reply, that in my judgment the case cited by the gentleman from Ohio is indefensible; but I have recited cases that are far worse, in that these boys in Georgia camps are not even permitted to work. They are idling away their time in three Georgia camps and can not secure their discharge. No intelligible reason can be given for such treatment. Let us bring the boys home now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, while we are on this question of the soldier boys in France, I would like to say that there are a great many fathers and mothers in this great land of ours who feel proud of their boys who have made the supreme sacrifice on the fields of France. A great many of the boys are still living, and we think of them; and I am wondering whether the War Department can not provide some means whereby the fathers and mothers of this country can send these boys a little money. I received a letter from a young man to-day who is located in France. He is not yet 20 years of age. He volunteered in the service last July. This letter was written on the 15th day of last December, and in that letter he said to me: "I dislike very much to ask for any money, but I have not received one cent of money from our Government since I entered the service of my country." Now, it seems to me there is something radically wrong there when this great Government of ours can not provide these boys with a cent of money for months at a time. We can furnish and appropriate large sums of money for other purposes, for other people, but we can not do anything for these boys who have shed their blood and have made the sacrifice for us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, referring to the incident that the gentleman from Wisconsin referred to about the boy who was court-martialed because he left camp to go to the home of his dying mother on the advice of his sister, I want to say that I think he refers to the same case I have in mind. The proceedings of the court-martial were sent to the War Department here in Washington just a few days ago, and the officer who examined what we would call the bill of exceptions in the case immediately recommended that the boy be restored to all of his rights in the Army and that he be immediately released from Fort Leavenworth. I am very glad to say that this young officer who had the honor and integrity and courage to make this recommendation comes from my district. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE]. [Applause.]

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, several days ago the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] placed in the RECORD a statement issued by the War Department showing what had been accomplished during the period of the war by American manufacturers in the way of manufacturing war munitions. It was a most remarkable statement, particularly in view of the fact that an increased burden had been placed upon American manufacturers, because at the very outset of this war the central powers were able to conquer Belgium and the industrial part of northern France, which included large deposits of coal and iron in those sections. The American manufacturers met that situation in a way that reflects great credit not only upon the manufacturers but upon the laboring people of the country who assisted in bringing about that great result.

In a newspaper article a few days ago Mr. J. Leonard Replogle, former steel administrator and member of the War Industries Board, said:

There will be no brighter pages in the history of the greatest and most terrible war the world has ever known than those which describe the deeds of the steel makers of this country, who wiped commercialism from their slate and set themselves to the herculean task of meeting all emergencies, cooperating with the Government in every possible way, and doing everything humanly possible to help win the war.

About a month ago Mr. Charles M. Schwab, former president of the Bethlehem Steel Co. and now chairman of its board of directors, made a speech in the city of New York, in which he stated the achievements of that company in the way of manufacturing war munitions during this war. It was such a remarkable statement that I thought it would be of interest to the House and the country and to the future historian of this war that these results should be placed in some permanent form. I therefore addressed a letter to the president of the company, Mr. E. G. Grace, and asked him to give me a summary of these results. I have his reply in my hand, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BETHLEHEM STEEL CO.,
South Bethlehem, Pa., December 23, 1918.

Hon. S. J. STEELE, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN STEELE: It gives us much pleasure, in response to your letter of the 19th ultimo, to outline, in part, our production for the Government and the allies during the period of the recent world war.

While all of our plants were employed directly in the furnishing of war essentials, we could hardly attempt, at this time, to go into statistics showing the quantities of steel produced by us in various forms, such as armor plate, forgings, shell steel, air flasks, structural shapes, engine shafts, castings, etc., nor would it be advisable to enter into the magnitude of the new construction and extensions to our plants to produce war materials, but we will endeavor to give you a report descriptive of our production of ordnance material and shipbuilding.

ORDNANCE MATERIAL.

There was supplied by the Bethlehem Steel Co. to the United States Government and its European allies during the world war a total of 3,319 guns, together with their mounts and such accessories, including ammunition wagons, as are appropriate and necessary for their use. The guns in question include guns of all sizes, from the largest guns now in general use in our service—namely, 14-inch—down to the smallest gun used in the field, excepting only rifles. There are 14-inch, 12-inch, 9.2-inch, 6-inch, 5-inch, 4-inch, and 3-inch guns.

As compared with this, we are reliably informed that all other concerns of this country, including Government arsenals, furnished approximately 2,500 gun equipments complete, and the performance of the Bethlehem Steel Co. was approximately 60 per cent of the total of the entire country.

Since the time of our entry into the war, in April, 1917, there were shipped in complete units, in calibers up to 9.2 inches, to this and allied countries from Bethlehem 1,350 units, and from every other place in this country, including Government arsenals, 710 units, making a total of 2,060, showing 65 per cent of the entire production as coming from Bethlehem.

In addition to the finished guns, there was supplied by the Bethlehem Steel Co. to the United States Government and its European allies, in the past three years, semifinished guns in the form of forgings upward to 55,000,000 pounds, with an additional 8,500,000 pounds supplied in the form of forgings for naval torpedoes. This does not include forgings for our own finished guns, but in this semifinished-gun total of 55,000,000 pounds it is well to state that this poundage is the equivalent of approximately 10,000 finished guns, so that in all, the Bethlehem Steel Co. has shipped over 13,000 completed or partially completed guns in this world conflict. Of this amount—55,000,000 pounds—35,000,000 pounds have been made since our entry into the war in April, 1917, and is approximately 65 per cent of the total furnished by the entire country, including our Government arsenals. It is well to know that approximately 2,000,000 pounds per month have been supplied the French Government, who, in turn, have manufactured finished guns for the United States forces in France.

There has been supplied ammunition for the above-mentioned guns to the number of between 18,000,000 and 19,000,000 complete rounds, with an additional 1,500,000 projectiles. This in itself was approximately 40 per cent of the entire shipments of this country since the world war began in August, 1914.

In addition to the above-mentioned materials, this company has placed in operation three large plants for the manufacture of high explosives, and for the filling of projectiles and fuses, and for the assembly of complete ammunition.

There has also been maintained by the Bethlehem Steel Co. throughout the war three proving grounds for the testing of guns, projectiles, powders, and fuses. These proving grounds not only served the United States Government and its allies for testing the materials supplied by the Bethlehem Steel Co., but carried on tests of similar materials for other companies.

There has been fired from the proving grounds of the Bethlehem Steel Co. during the war a total of 390,481 rounds for the purpose of testing war materials being delivered to the United States Government and its allies.

SHIPBUILDING.

From August 3, 1917, the date upon which the United States Shipping Board commandeered all merchant tonnage, to the 15th instant the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation (Ltd.) delivered 17 tank vessels and 38 cargo vessels, making a total of 55 merchant ships with a deadweight tonnage of approximately 525,000 tons, representing over 20 per cent of the total steel merchant tonnage delivered during that period.

During the same period there were delivered 25 destroyers for our Navy and 15 submarines, representing over 60 per cent of the total number of destroyers delivered to the Navy during that period and nearly all of the submarine boats. In addition to this we have, at the present time, nearing completion and in the water, 34 destroyers and 8 submarines, as well as 2 tank vessels, 5 cargo vessels, and 2 tugs.

We trust this information will be of interest to you, and with the compliments of the season,

Yours, very truly, E. G. GRACE, President.

Mr. STEELE. The particular credit this company is entitled to is that at a time of great stress in the history of the country they voluntarily placed at the disposal of this Government their entire plant, so that in that time of great crisis the Government was able to get the benefit of that wonderful plant, which I have heard Mr. Schwab say was 50 per cent more efficient than the great Krupp plant at Essen, in Germany. [Applause.] It was a valuable asset to this country during this time of great war conflict to have had the benefit and assistance and equipment of this complete plant, and therefore its work was a great achievement for them and for the country.

It turned out 65 per cent of all the large munitions and really large guns manufactured in this country during the great contest. Their plant at the time of the signing of the armistice was engaged 100 per cent upon Government work. At the outbreak of the war, in 1914, the Bethlehem plant employed about 8,000 persons, and at the time of signing the armistice 32,000, and, including the subsidiary plants, about 75,000 persons. At a hearing before the House Committee on Naval Affairs several years ago Mr. Grace said that the officers of his company were first patriotic Americans, and if ever the country got into trouble the company would place its entire plant at the disposal of the Government. It has faithfully kept that promise. The Government itself fixed the prices; the Government itself fixed the price of labor; and they were the instrument of the Government; and the fact that the Government had this large plant at its disposal, without having to spend a dollar or risk a dollar in the erection of a plant of that kind, was of great material benefit in bringing this war to an end when it did. And if it had not been for the assistance that the Bethlehem plant and other steel plants gave to the allies previous to the entry of the Government in this war the result might have been different. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to detain the House for a moment to make mention of a bill which I introduced on yesterday following the introduction in the Senate of a similar bill by Senator PHELAN, of California. It has for its object the changing of the name of Sequoia National Park in California to "Roosevelt National Park."

The suggestion was made by Mr. Lane and by Mr. Mather, the Director of National Parks. The proposed park is an enlargement of the smaller parks heretofore called the Sequoia National Park. The greater park, when it is authorized by Congress, will include some wonderful scenic features; not only the largest grove of Sequoia gigantea, the largest trees of the world, but it will also include the great canyon of the Kern and King Rivers, as well as the tremendous Alpine Meadows; and it will also include the highest point of continental United States, Mount Whitney. I think it is extremely fitting that this great park, which includes some of the most magnificent scenic features in the world, should be named after Theodore Roosevelt. It has in many of its aspects the grand features which were characteristic of Roosevelt himself.

I thought it proper to direct the attention of the House to the fact that this bill has been introduced and may come up for consideration before long. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to indorse the statement which the gentleman from California has made. Three years ago I went through this Sequoia National Park and the King and Kern Valleys that he speaks of. We went in, out of the reach of the telegraph or the mail, with a pack train and I spent there two of the most interesting and healthful weeks of my life. I do not suppose it is possible to compare different beauties of nature according to their relative excellence, but if there is any finer scenery in the world than this I should like to see it. But until I have seen it I shall be skeptical about it and be satisfied with the wonderful picturesqueness and variety of the valleys and gorges and mountains and chasms and streams of this extraordinary region. It did not seem to me it was useful for anything except a great camping-out place for the American people. Possibly a few sure-footed animals might get grazing there, but it was apparently created as a grand aggregation of scenic beauty, where tired man could refresh and enjoy himself. As the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] has said, it is very desirable that the present Sequoia Park should be enlarged so as to include this neighboring tract of wonderful scenery, and then nothing could be more appropriate than to name the whole after such a lover of nature as Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14078) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 15, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair hears none.

THE CENSUS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at section 16, page 17.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Census was, in section 16, on page 18, line 19, after the word "this," to strike out "act," and insert "act"; in the same line, after the word "shall," to insert "so far as practicable"; and in line 22, after the word "city," to insert "township, or other civil division," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 16. That the compensation of enumerators shall be determined by the Director of the Census as follows: In subdivisions where he shall deem such remuneration sufficient, an allowance of not less than 2 nor more than 4 cents for each inhabitant; not less than 20 nor more than 30 cents for each establishment of productive industry reported; not less than 20 nor more than 30 cents for each farm reported; not less than 20 nor more than 50 cents for each irrigation or drainage enterprise reported; and 10 cents for each barn and inclosure containing live stock not on farms. In other subdivisions the Director of the Census may fix a mixed rate of not less than $1 nor more than $2 per day and, in addition, an allowance of not less than 1 nor more than 3 cents for each inhabitant enumerated, and not less than 15 nor more than 20 cents for each farm and each establishment of productive industry reported. In other subdivisions per diem rates shall be fixed by the director according to the difficulty of enumeration, having special reference to the regions to be canvassed and the sparsity of settlement or other considerations pertinent thereto. The compensation allowed to an enumerator in any such district shall not be less than $3 nor more than $6 per day of eight hours' actual field work, and no payment shall be made for time in excess of eight hours for any one day. The subdivisions or enumeration districts to which the several rates of compensation shall apply shall be designated by the Director of the Census at least two weeks in advance of the enumeration. No claim for mileage or traveling expenses shall be allowed any enumerator in either class of subdivisions, except in extreme cases, and then only when authority has been previously granted by the Director of the Census; and the decision of the director as to the amount due any enumerator shall be final: Provided, That within the limits of continental United States each supervisor to be appointed or selected under this act shall be an actual resident of the district, and each enumerator to be appointed or selected under this act shall, so far as practicable, be an actual resident of the subdivision within which his duties are to be performed; but an enumerator may be appointed if he be an actual resident of the city, township, or other civil division of which the subdivision in which his duties are to be performed is a part.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 20, page 21, line 22, after the word "having," to strike out "five thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 20. That the enumeration of the population required by section 1 of this act shall be taken as of the 1st day of January, and it shall be the duty of each enumerator to commence the enumeration of his district on the day following, unless the Director of the Census in his discretion shall defer the enumeration in said district by reason of climatic or other conditions which would materially interfere with the proper conduct of the work; but in any event it shall be the duty of each enumerator to prepare the returns hereinbefore required to be made and to forward the same to the supervisor of his district within 30 days from the commencement of the enumeration of his district: Provided, That in any city having 2,500 inhabitants or more under the preceding census the enumeration of the population shall be completed within two weeks from the commencement thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to refer to the last amendment agreed to, for the purpose of asking the Senator having the bill in charge a question. I notice that the Senate committee has stricken out 5,000 and inserted 2,500, referring to the inhabitants of a city. That amendment virtually means a doubling of the cost in securing the number of inhabitants as against the provision made by the House.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall state to the Senator that it refers to places having 2,500 inhabitants at the last census. By this time most of the places that had 2,500 inhabitants at the last census have three, four, and five thousand inhabitants. The amendment is in the interest of the promptest possible returns.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought that in cities of 5,000 inhabitants the return ought to be made within two weeks, as provided by the House. The Senate committee has stricken out 5,000 and reduced it to 2,500, as applied to cities where the returns shall be finished within two weeks.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If you take places that had 2,500 inhabitants 10 years ago you will come nearer to reaching your figure of 5,000 now than by using the number 5,000 in this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator should know that many cities that had hardly any people at all 10 years ago may have now 2,500 and perhaps all of them. There is no doubt there are as many of them that have grown in population so as to reach nearly 2,500 as there are cities that have grown from 2,500 inhabitants to 5,000 inhabitants.

I wish to ask the Senator, however, what the present law provides. Does it not apply to cities of 5,000 inhabitants? If I remember correctly, the provision applies to cities of 5,000 and the object was exactly what the Senator has stated—to secure early returns. The past experience has been that in a city of 5,000 people the returns could be made within two weeks.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The existing law contains a clause making this provision applicable to cities of 5,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is very much better than the Senate committee amendment. In other words, if there is a city of 3,000 people, under the Senate committee amendment the two weeks' provision does not apply, and it certainly should apply, because there is no reason why in any city with a population of 5,000 the returns should not be made within two weeks. It has always been done in the past. I think the Senate committee made a mistake in reducing the number.

Mr. SHEPPARD. We followed the recommendation of the committee of experts who prepared the bill for the House. The House made the change in the face of that recommendation. I desire to read to the Senator the recommendation of the committee of experts.

Mr. SMOOT. All I want to say is that if 2,500 is to become the law, then every city with 3,000 people will not have its returns made in two weeks, but more than likely it will take four weeks and involve twice the amount of cost that it should bear.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That would be the case if you left the provision at 5,000, would it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then the enumerators would take 30 days for all cities under 5,000.

Mr. SMOOT. But under this provision they are compelled to make the return within two weeks.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; in all cities having populations of not less than 2,500. If we do not put in this provision, they will take 30 days, and thus prolong the time for the report.

Mr. SMOOT. I either misunderstand the amendment or else the Senator does. Under the House provision, if there was a city of 4,999 inhabitants, the return would have to be made within two weeks. Under the amendment the Senate committee has made, if it is a city of 3,000 people——

Mr. SHEPPARD. But the minimum population for two weeks' requirement is 5,000. If the population is under 5,000, enumerators may take the longer time. The minimum population limit for cities in which the enumeration is to be completed within two weeks has been lowered from 5,000 to 2,500. The committee of experts say:

> The enumeration of all areas of fairly compact population should be completed in the shortest possible time, and it seems entirely possible to have the limit of two weeks apply in 1920 to all places of 2,500 inhabitants or more, as shown by the census of 1910.

That is the minimum population of cities within which the returns must be made in two weeks.

Mr. SMOOT. The proviso as passed by the House reads this way:

> That in any city having 5,000 inhabitants or more under the preceding census the enumeration of the population shall be completed within two weeks from the commencement thereof.

The Senate committee has stricken out "5,000" and inserted "2,500." So under the Senate committee amendment if the population is 3,000 or 3,501 they are not compelled to have completed returns within two weeks and they will take 30 days.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is the intention of the Senate committee to require the return from all cities of 2,500 inhabitants or more to be made within two weeks. That is the intention of the committee. If we have not expressed it properly, it is our fault.

Mr. SMOOT. I will take it up with the Senator later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so expressed.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 16, to insert:

> The provisions of this section shall also apply to the collection of the information required and authorized by the act entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," and by acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, that amendment should be disagreed to, because it appears in a different form in another part of that section. I ask that it be disagreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, in section 27, page 27, line 12, after the words "Census Office," to insert "or, instead of such an allowance, their actual subsistence expenses, not to exceed $5 per day," so as to make the section read:

> SEC. 27. That the Director of the Census may authorize the expenditure of necessary sums for the actual and necessary traveling expenses of the officers and employees of the Census Office, including an allowance in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $4 per day during their necessary absence from the Census Office, or, instead of such an allowance, their actual subsistence expenses, not to exceed $5 per day; and he may authorize the incidental, miscellaneous, and contingent expenses necessary for the carrying out of this act, as herein provided, and not otherwise, including advertising in newspapers, the purchase of manuscripts, books of reference, and periodicals, the rental of sufficient quarters in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and the furnishing thereof, and expenditures necessary for compiling, printing, publishing, and distributing the results of the census, the purchase of necessary paper and other supplies, the purchase, rental, exchange, construction, and repair of mechanical appliances, the compensation of such permanent and temporary clerks as may be employed under the provisions of this act and the act establishing the permanent Census Office and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and all other expenses incurred under authority conveyed in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 33, page 30, line 16, after the word "certificate," to insert "and that the Director of the Census is authorized to furnish transcripts of tables and other records and to prepare special statistical compilations for State or local officials, private concerns, or individuals upon the payment of the actual cost of such work: Provided, however, That in no case shall information furnished under the authority of this act be used to the detriment of the person or persons to whom such information relates," so as to make the section read:

> SEC. 33. That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, upon the written request of the governor of any State or Territory or of a court of record, to furnish such governor or court of record with certified copies of so much of the population or agricultural returns as may be requested, upon the payment of the actual cost of making such copies and $1 additional for certification; and that the Director of the Census is further authorized, in his discretion, to furnish to individuals such data from the population schedules as may be desired for genealogical or other proper purposes, upon payment of the actual cost of searching the records and $1 for supplying a certificate; and that the Director of the Census is authorized to furnish transcripts of tables and other records and to prepare special statistical compilations for State or local officials, private concerns, or individuals upon the payment of the actual cost of such work: Provided, however, That in no case shall information furnished under the authority of this act be used to the detriment of the person or persons to whom such information relates. All moneys hereafter received by the Bureau of the Census in payment for labor and materials used in furnishing transcripts of census records or special statistical compilations from such records shall be deposited to the credit of the appropriation for collecting statistics.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any further committee amendments?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, we are about to return to amendments which have been passed over. Some of them involve controverted items, and in order that there may be as full an attendance as possible while they are being considered, I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Lodge
Bankhead	Fernald	Jones, N. Mex.	McKellar

I wish also to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained by illness.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. POMERENE. I have been requested to announce the absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] on official business of the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL]. I will ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] on account of death in his family.

I desire also to announce the absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] on account of illness.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is unavoidably absent.

I will let these announcements stand for the day.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will state the first amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment passed over is in section 5, page 4, line 10, after the words "Director of the Census," to strike out "$7,000" and insert "$7,500," so as to read:

SEC. 5. That during the decennial census period the annual compensation of the officials of the Census Office shall be as follows: The Director of the Census, $7,500.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am going to take the time of the Senate only for a few moments to state my position on this amendment.

The Director of the Census is paid $6,000 annually, which compensation is provided for in the annual appropriation bill; but during the census 10 years ago the Director of the Census was paid $1,000 additional, or $7,000 per annum.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Senator must remember that 20 years ago an increase of $1,500 was allowed the Director of the Census.

Mr. SMOOT. At that time, however, the Director of the Census was receiving $5,000, instead of $6,000; in other words, with the $1,500 he then received, $6,500.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But Congress allowed him $7,500 for the decennial census period 20 years ago; and if what the Senator says is correct, Congress gave him an addition of $2,500 for the three years.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, in the last census that was taken the Director of the Census was allowed $7,000 per annum; and, as I stated, that is a thousand dollars more than his regular salary. I recognize that there is more work done in the Census Office while the census is being taken than in the ordinary year; but, upon the other hand, there are many, many more hundreds and thousands of employees to do the work; and it does seem to me that the House was wise in fixing the salary at $7,000 instead of $7,500. I say this because the heads of bureaus and of some of the divisions are receiving no more than $5,000, but some of them $6,000, which the Director of the Census in ordinary times receives.

If this policy is to be followed out, whenever there is any legislation passed that throws an additional amount of work for a short time upon the head of any bureau or any division, we must immediately make an additional appropriation to pay him for that extra period. I think the policy is an unwise one; and I believe that the House, in giving the thousand dollars extra, has done all that ought to be done. Therefore I shall content myself by asking that a vote of the Senate be taken upon the question of whether the director shall be paid $7,000 or $7,500. I recognize the ability and energy of the present director and appreciate his labors in the past.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Senate Census Committee has made, on the whole, a decrease of $500 in the salary list granted by the House to these supervisory officials for the decennial-census period. We cut out several positions altogether; we kept some at the figures fixed by the House, and we made small increases in the salaries of others; we hope that the disposition we made will be sustained by the Senate.

We are merely allowing the director what his predecessor was given 20 years ago for the Twelfth Census period. The census next year is to be probably the greatest and the most complete ever taken in the history of the world. The director receives a permanent salary of $6,000 a year, but his duties are going to be multiplied fifty-fold during the three years of the coming decennial-census period. We believe it but fair that we should follow the precedent established so long ago as 20 years and give him this small increase of $500 over what the House has allowed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that the work of the Census Bureau during the census period is in no wise comparable to the work of the ordinary bureaus of the various departments. It is high-pressure work. It is work that requires the time and attention of men nights, days, and Sundays in order to complete the work and get these statistics into proper form. It involves in this case the handling of an estimated number of 113,000,000 cards, which have to be counted four times, the equivalent of handling about 500,000,000 cards once. Then, too, there is the responsibility of wisely directing the expenditure of $20,000,000. No business concern in this country which contemplated spending that amount of money would be able to get a man competent to handle it for the meager sum of $7,000.

Twenty years ago the Director of the Census was allowed $7,500. Ten years ago, for some reason, the salary was reduced to $7,000. The work has largely increased. The number of people to be counted and the responsibilities have increased. Everybody knows that the purchasing power of a dollar at this time is very much less than it was 10 years ago, 50 per cent of what it was at that time, possibly 40 per cent of what it was 20 years ago; so that the director's present contemplated salary of $7,500 is much less than it was 10 years ago at $7,000, and much less than it was 20 years ago at the salary of $7,500.

While we must be economical in the passage of these supply bills, and, while we must not give a dollar more than is justly due to these people, yet we must be fair and just to these public servants who are required to do this responsible work; and I hope the Senate will uphold the decision of the committee in these amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course I recognize, as I stated before, that there is extra labor in the Census Bureau at the time when the census is being taken. I recognize that there are millions of cards to handle, but we all know that the Director of the Census does not handle the cards. He has nothing to do with them, other than to give the order as to how they shall be cared for; and, speaking of a private corporation distributing $20,000,000 securing the services of a man at $7,500, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who has charge of hundreds of millions of acres of land, who pays out millions and millions of dollars annually, whose employees usually are greater in number than those in the Census Office, is receiving a salary of $5,000, and has been receiving it for a number of years.

If we are going to take into consideration the question of the high cost of living, that applies to every single employee and officer of the Government of the United States; and if we are going to make any kind of an advance upon that ground, it ought to be universal, and we ought not to pick one out here and another there.

As I said, I hope that the House provision will prevail.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few observations before the vote is taken upon this amendment. Like many other Senators, I have been struck with astonishment at the ease with which appropriations can be obtained. It is true, technical objections are often urged against meritorious propositions and obstacles are sometimes interposed to appropriations entirely legitimate and proper; but, as a working formula, I think it may safely be said that appropriations are often made by Congress which lack merit and are not grounded in morality or justice. There is too much of a disposition to follow the suggestions and wishes of bureaus and public officials who are benefited, or who seek to be benefited, by the legislation which is sought. I know it is difficult to always get the right angle from which to judge as to the propriety and wisdom of a given item or as to the justice of a proposed appropriation; but more and more Congress relies upon the representations of those agencies of the Government which will have to do with the appropriation or will be benefited by the appropriation in legislation relating thereto. Notwithstanding the fact that in many instances where representatives of the department or bureau or division who appear before committees have a direct interest in the legislation, particularly if it is an appropriation, there is a disposition upon the part of the committee to sit with open mouths as if Sir Oracle were speaking. In making this statement I do not desire to impugn the honesty or integrity of the agents or employees or officials of the Government who seek the appropriations or appear before committees to testify in respect thereto. The departments and bureaus and agencies of the Government are interested in extending their powers and jurisdiction and authority. Often the head or chief of bureau or agency feels that the particular activity in which he and those under him are engaged is of vital interest to the Government. He is ambitious to extend its functions and powers and authority. Often officials feel that their work or the work of the bureau or agency with which they are identified is of supreme importance to the Government and that sufficient recognition has not been accorded it in the past. Anyone who has studied the growth and development of the departments, bureaus, and agencies of our Government can not help but be impressed with the view that those who have been connected with the same have exhibited great zeal in extending the authority and activities of such organizations.

A cell, so to speak, is organized and it increases in strength and power and soon ceases to be unicellular and becomes multicellular. Each cell, as it is created, expands and grows, and those connected with it are interested in emphasizing its importance. Of course, it is to be expected that every representative of a governmental agency, when appearing before a committee of Congress, will emphasize the work which has been performed by the organization with which he is connected. He seeks to make a good showing and to aggrandize the agency or bureau for which he speaks. It is a matter of common knowledge that there has been competition between bureaus and governmental instrumentalities. If one publishes a magazine or paper exploiting its achievements, some other bureau or department or agency follows the same course and attempts a better publication. If an increase in salary is given to one bureau, immediate demands are made in other bureaus, and there is a constant effort to show that the work performed by a given agency is greater or more important than the work accomplished by some other agency of the Government. Under such circumstances very strong presentations are made to committees, and Senators and Representatives, perhaps properly and certainly inevitably, are impressed with the enthusiasm and earnestness with which various items of desired appropriations are advocated. Requests, if not demands for increased compensation, if not constant, are so persistently made as to be regarded as more than intermittent. I have sometimes felt that there is not sufficient scrutiny and examination of estimates submitted by Government departments and bureaus and by the chiefs of divisions and officials of the Government. We know that millions are often asked for when hundreds of thousands only should be appropriated. I am afraid that the spirit which has been developed since we have been talking in billions has become somewhat of a mental strabismus upon the part of all. A dollar seems so insignificant as to be beneath our notice. To add a few hundred thousand dollars to an appropriation bill seems unimportant, and to take millions out of the Treasury excites no concern and provokes little if any comment. The Democratic Party historically has been the party of economy and has insisted upon wise and economical expenditures of the public moneys. During war times there is a tendency to depart from safe and sane paths of legislation. In the hurry incident to war and in the haste required for enacting imperative war legislation, watchfulness of appropriations and strict economy did not always obtain.

Indeed, there is a disposition to pass unchallenged whatever legislation is asked for by the Government, and particularly by those departments that are intrusted with war activities and with those officials who are particularly charged with conducting military and naval operations. The result is that war usually breeds extravagance. Of course, war means waste, but the war is now practically concluded. We are passing from the war clouds into the light of peace. There must be a sharp turn in Government appropriations. There must be no haste and confusion in making appropriations. There must be calm, careful, and painstaking examination of every bill calling for appropriations and of every penny that is taken from the Public Treasury. The Democratic Party can not afford to disregard its principles and its past record which calls for economy.

I lift my voice to warn the leaders of the Democratic Party that unless they demand and practice economy in dealing with public funds, the party will be held to strict account by the public, and if it is guilty of extravagance it will be sternly and deservedly rebuked by the patriotic people of the land. It is particularly important that there should be economy at this time. The expenses incident to the war and growing out of the war have not yet been paid. There are billions of dollars of claims yet to be liquidated. To meet the stupendous amounts which the Government will be called upon to pay, will require the laying of heavy and, indeed, burdensome taxes, and will call for the strictest economy. Those who study our industrial situation and are cognizant of the present resources of the people, know that there will be difficulty in obtaining the enormous sums necessary to discharge the pressing obligations of the Government. The transition from peace to war will be accompanied by industrial disturbances. Indeed, we will be fortunate to escape serious financial difficulties. If all act patriotically together, keeping in view the welfare of the Nation and the peace and happiness and prosperity of all classes and of all sections of our Nation, I believe we will escape financial disaster and pass successfully through the troubled social and economic waters into the calm sea which will bear the ship of state into a haven of progress and prosperity. This hour calls for an exhibition of sanity and common sense upon the part of legislators. Expenditures must be cut wherever possible. It is not a suitable time to make a general increase in salaries.

In most labor circles there may be reductions in compensation. Of course, war produces high prices, and high prices result in wage increases. The laboring men are always sufferers during periods when nations are passing from inflation and high prices to a stage calling for a reduction in prices and in the scale of wages. Of course, everyone is concerned in the welfare of those who toil. Their interests must be guarded, and to secure the welfare of the laboring man, now more than ever, requires the earnest and sympathetic consideration of the Government as well as that of the employers of labor.

But it is not the time, in my opinion, to begin raising the wages of those in the Government service. They have many advantages over the workingmen employed in the various activities of our land. Protected by the civil service and guaranteed positions for life, they have peculiar and special advantages which should be taken into consideration when the question of raising salaries of Government employees is up for consideration.

Speaking to the question under consideration, we find that the salary of the Superintendent of the Census is $6,000 a year. The duties of this office during seven years of the decennial periods are not very onerous. While the census is being taken his duties and responsibilities are augmented. At the same time he is given additional help and numerous competent and efficient aids. The House added a thousand dollars to the salary provided by law, and we are now asked to increase that amount to fifteen hundred dollars. Generally speaking, it is not a wise or safe plan to increase the compensation of employees because there is a temporary increase in the work devolved upon them. If this is done it provokes demands in all lines of governmental service. Occasionally there will be indefinite periods when the work in a bureau or of some employee may be increased over that required during the normal period. It is difficult to measure what such work performed for a short time is worth. The person expecting the position knows that such position calls for increased work at infrequent times. He accepts the position with the knowledge of that fact. To give one additional compensation will, as stated, provoke demands from others. The precedent is bad and the consequences of such a course can not be fully apprehended. The committee amendment, in my opinion, is unwise and should be rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the official whose salary is in question is one of the most useful members of the administration, one of the most efficient, and deserving of all sorts of praise and all due compensation. I am not at all astonished that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] came to the relief of his colleague [Mr. SMOOT]. I agree with both of them. I do not see why now, when the whole world is threatened with national and international bankruptcy, we should give way to everybody who wants an increase of salary; and in saying that, I do not mean that this man is to be classed as "everybody," because he is beyond that. He is outside of that class. He deserves very much more than to be classed with the ordinary people who are serving the Government; but it does seem to me that we ought to put a check upon this idea of demanding from every quarter, everywhere—I am not so much afraid of this particular case as I am of the general trend of it all—an increase because of the increased cost of living. The increased cost of living is going back to a normal status after a while; but after you once fix these salaries they will never go back at all.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator know that this increase is only temporary, only for three years, and that at the end of that time it automatically goes back?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I did not know that, to be frank with the Senator, and that would reconcile the proposition somewhat to my mind. But I started out to say a few words about the general trend of getting out of the Government every cent that everybody can.

Just at this time, when patriotism and self-denial and self-sacrifice are very highly called for, everybody is coming up, from the laboring man in the navy yard up to the very highest official, demanding something to "compensate them for the sacrifices of the war." Why should they be compensated? The balance of us have suffered without compensation. The ordinary blacksmith and school-teacher—and especially the school-teacher, who is doing more good than anybody else—have not found that it was possible to recoup at the public expense while they were making their sacrifices in order to carry on the war. I have not found it possible to recoup, and I do not want to. I would not vote for a proposition to increase the salary of a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives because we have been called upon to stand our part of the gaff in this war. It seems to me everybody ought to be willing to stand his share of it. Your boys have gone; they have stood their share of it. Some of them have come home, thank God, without a scratch. A great many have come home wounded and hurt. Some of them are left there to be buried "where the tree fell."

Now, why should we, whenever an appropriation bill is up, appeal to the charity and philanthropy of Congress to increase a man's salary because he has suffered while the war was going on? Of course he has suffered; but he has suffered in a bomb-proof place. All of us here have suffered in bomb-proof places, and there has not been very much suffering about it. I would have been very glad to have taken my boys' places in this struggle. I think I would. I do not know whether I would or not. I am not so sure of myself, but I think I would. But not having done it, being unable to do it, why should I appeal to the American people to recoup me for the high cost of living due to the war, and why should anybody else do it? Why should not every man be willing to say, "Now is the moment of supreme sacrifice; and my sacrifice has not been so awfully great, either; I have not starved. I have not done without enough clothing to the point of being arrested for indecent exposure. I have been able to go through with it all." Why should not that spirit be spread around among the American people, and why should we not tell the people who stayed at home during all this time—some of them because they wanted to, some of them because they could not help it—why should we not tell the people who stayed at home all this time, "You must no recoup your war losses at the expense of the American people; you must have patriotism and self-abnegation enough to be willing to say that you and I have thrown that much into the pot for which the world has played, and which the world has won in behalf of freedom, in behalf of democracy, and in behalf—as we all hope—of a league of nations to keep the peace of the world for years to come?"

I am not making this speech so much about this particular case. If there is any man who deserves peculiar reward and increase of salary, it is this particular man. I am not talking about that so much; but I am talking about the general idea that seems to prevail all over the country that this is a time to bite something out of the Public Treasury, when it seems to me it ought to be a time for patriotic citizens to say, "I will not bite; if I bite, I will bite later when the world is not threatened with bankruptcy and when the United States is free to carry on its own domestic concerns without the extra burden of taking care of Armenia, Serbia, Belgium, Roumania, Syria, and Palestine, all of which must come out of our pockets in one way or another, publicly or privately."

Now, why can we not just simply say, "This is a time for self-denial and not a time for self-assertion; this is a time to get along with less salary than we have been having if we can do it, not a time to demand higher salary?"

Mr. President, this world either has a soul or it has not. This country either has a soul or it has not. If it has no soul, of course, everybody is for himself and the devil take the hindmost; but if it has a soul, it seems to me that that soul ought to express itself in acts, not merely in words; and those acts ought to consist in taking less, if we can, from the public than we hitherto have taken and not in taking more.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi. It occurs to me to suggest that the approaching census will involve a great deal more work, labor, and responsibility than any other census which has ever been taken in the United States. There will be more to do, more to be responsible for, in taking the Fourteenth Census than there was 10 years ago or at any previous census. The work is continually growing.

It further occurs to me to suggest that $7,500 now is not nearly the equivalent of what $7,000 was 10 years ago. The committee amendment seems to me to be fair and right, and I shall support it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the statement made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], made under a misapprehension perhaps. He was probably comparing the size of the Land Office with the permanent Census Bureau.

Mr. SMOOT. That was what I was doing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The pending bill provides for the census period, which is a term of three years, during which the entire decennial census will be taken.

I have before me the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the year ending June 30, 1920, as reported by the House committee, and I find that the total number of employees outside of special agents, for which an appropriation of $6,000 was made, is 512, whereas during the census period that is about to ensue a force of 4,000 clerks will be employed in connection with the Bureau of the Census, and a field force consisting of supervisors, enumerators, and special agents numbering from 85,000 to 90,000.

The work of selecting this vast organization, the responsibility for their selection, the responsibility for their work, rests finally upon the Director of the Census. It seems to me, in view of the very large number of people to be directed, the amount of money to be expended, and the care with which the statistics have to be assembled, $7,500 is an exceedingly moderate salary.

Mr. KING. If the Senator——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment. I will say, in answer to the junior Senator from Utah, in relation to the appeals made here for increases in salary, and our gullibility, that in this particular matter I had rather an inside view of the working of the Census Office, because I was chief of the largest division of the Census Office a good many years ago—in the 1890 census. I therefore had rather a familiar view of the inside working of the Census Office, and I know from actual experience that not only do they have a day force there but they have a night force, and the Director of the Census and the chiefs of divisions and expert special agents, the men who are responsible for the conduct of the clerks and the work done by them, are not only occupied many hours during the day but during the night and frequently on Sundays, because it is high-pressure work, requiring constant attention under high-pressure methods, which are very exhausting and for which all these men should receive at least the fair compensation which is provided by this bill as amended by the committee. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] requests the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. The question is on agreeing to the Senate committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. In his absence I transfer my pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the same vote would be recorded on the other increases proposed, and I shall not, therefore, ask for a record vote upon them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. There is one amendment which I wish to submit. In line 16, after the words "chief of division," to strike out "$2,250" and insert "$2,500."

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are some amendments on the preceding page which have not been acted upon, and they will be stated.

The next amendment passed over was, in section 5, page 4, line 10, after the words "Director of the Census," to strike out "$7,000" and insert "$7,500"; in line 11, after the words "assistant director," to strike out "$4,500; three chief statisticians and the chief clerk, $3,000 each; two" and insert "$5,000; the chief clerk and three chief satisticians, $4,000 each; three"; in line 13, after the words "chief statisticians," to strike out "$3,000"; and in line 14, after the word "geographer," to strike out "$2,750" and insert "$3,000 each," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That during the decennial census period the annual compensation of the officials of the Census Office shall be as follows: The Director of the Census, $7,500; the assistant director, $5,000; the chief clerk and three chief statisticians, $4,000 each; three other chief statisticians and the geographer, $3,000 each; the disbursing clerk, $3,000; the appointment clerk, $2,750; the chiefs of division, $2,250 each; the private secretary to the director, $2,250; the statistical experts, $2,000 each; and the stenographers provided for in section 3 of this act, $1,800 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] will now be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed by the Senator from Texas, in line 16, after the words "chiefs of division," to strike out "$2,250" and insert "$2,500."

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know that it would be wise at this time to ask the Senate to change any motion that may be made by the chairman of the committee, but the increase in salary for the chiefs of division from $2,250 to $2,500 is, I think, unwarranted. I will be content with just a viva voce vote of the Senate, without the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am told by the director that it is absolutely essential that this increase shall be made, in order to hold the services of competent men; that these men can get similar positions in the War Department and in the Treasury Department now at $2,500; and that the Internal Revenue Commissioner now has positions carrying $2,500 which he is very willing to tender them. The director will have the greatest difficulty in holding men with sufficient skill and ability at $2,250 per annum.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator, I desire to say that that statement is made to the members of the appropriations committee every year. I know it has been made for at least 12 years, but men who then held positions in the departments of the Government are still there, though the increases asked for have not been made. Many of the heads of divisions get $2,000 per annum, though some of them get $2,500, as is provided in the pending bill. Of course, we made exceptions as to the Census Department, and I so presume all of the others ought to be included.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to inform the Senator from Utah that, under the pending legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill in the House of Representatives, a number of the chiefs of divisions are given pay at the rate of $2,500 per annum, recognizing the fact that this is a proper time to give those men some equitable increase. That plan has been followed, and the House committee is certainly not wildly extravagant, but is much more economical than is the Senate committee. They have gone over the schedule of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and have granted increases of salaries to $2,500 as to a number of chief clerk positions.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not seen the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for this year, but I desire to say that there are one or two chiefs of divisions in the service of the Government who have been receiving for some time a salary of $2,500 per annum. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to state the reasons why they have been granted that salary, but there are reasons why they are receiving it, and good reasons, too, which do not apply to the Census Bureau.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, from the vote just taken and the motion now made by the chairman of the committee to increase the compensation of the officials embraced within the class contemplated by his motion it would seem—at least, to the casual observer—that the pledges of the Democratic Party in behalf of a reduction of governmental expenditures and economy were rather lightly regarded.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Utah that we have made a total decrease in the salary list as the bill came over from the other House.

Mr. KING. Conceding what the Senator from Texas has just stated—and, no doubt, his statement is correct—that does not lead me to change the statement just made. The bill as it came from the House shows an increase in the salaries of various officials provided for in the bill now under consideration. I do not know that there is any very great credit due because there has been a slight reduction in the aggregate amount carried by the bill as it came from the House and now reported by the Senate committee. The House bill, in my opinion, is too liberal in the appropriations made. The total amount required for the taking of the census is entirely too large for the results obtained. I have no doubt but what the same work could be performed by private individuals for a very much less sum than that which the Government will be required to pay. Of course, the taking of the census is a work which could not well be delegated to a private concern, no matter how honorable and efficient its personnel might be. But I desire to emphasize the fact that the party which has stood for economy, as I have heretofore suggested, should—particularly at this time, when the expenses of the Government are so gigantic—maintain its honorable record. We have always charged that the Republican Party was inefficient in its administration of public affairs and was wasteful and extravagant in the handling of the Public Treasury. The stupendous appropriations made during the period of the war, together with the charges intermittently made by the minority of extravagance upon the part of the party in power, influenced many people and led them to believe that this Democratic administration was not mindful of the public welfare and economical in its conduct of national affairs. I am afraid that an examination of some of the appropriations made will afford some justification for the feeling prevalent in some quarters. It has been stated that the recent defeat of the Democratic Party was in part chargeable to the belief entertained by some that it had not zealously guarded the Public Treasury and had not with that scrupulous care which should have characterized its course discharged its obligations as a servant and trustee of the people.

This is no time for an increase in the compensation of public officials. Here and there some glaring injustice can be found which, perhaps, should be remedied, but, generally speaking, there should be no revision of the salaries of Federal employees at the present time. We are in a condition of flux. The industrial and economic situation is uncertain, and abnormally high prices which have prevailed during the war, not only in the United States but throughout the world, inevitably will suffer a declination. It will not prove an easy task to readjust conditions. There is no question but what there will be in many activities sharp declines; not only raw materials but finished products, including food supplies, will suffer reductions in prices. There was far greater reason for an increase in the salaries of the employees of the Government when the war was on than at this time when the war is ended, and we are seeking to reach a peace basis without financial disaster or serious industrial and social unrest. Every possible effort should be made to economize and to reduce governmental expenditures. Public officials, particularly those who are intrenched in office for life, ought to be the first to aid in bringing about a prompt and satisfactory readjustment in the economic and social life of the Republic. As long as the toiling masses—those who work in mine and field and factory—may be affected, and possibly affected in a more or less serious way, by the changes compelled during the period of transition from war to peace, it would seem that those who have life positions, particularly positions which have proved and still do prove so attractive as to cause great competition to secure them, would not be the first to insist upon a revision upward of their schedules of compensation. I know it is popular to advocate high salaries and increased compensation, and one who objects to an increase for those in the public service usually arouses intense animosities. I believe not only in good wages but high wages for those who work and toil and who by their efforts produce the food we eat and the clothes we wear and construct the habitations in which we live. I would like to see the workingmen—the great toilers of our land—not only liberally but generously compensated. I hope the day may come when they will enjoy more leisure and have more of the comforts and pleasures of life than the past has awarded them. I am not in favor of making public offices so attractive by high salaries as to lead to the scrambling and competition that in the past and now exist to secure them.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] states that unless the salaries covered by his amendment are increased, it will be difficult to hold in the public service those now filling the positions. It might not be a misfortune if some in the public service should be separated from it. However, I do not entertain the view just expressed by the Senator. I do not hesitate to make the prophecy that if these men or any of the officials provided for in this bill leave the service, there will be a multitude of competent persons seeking their vacant posts. There are now numerous applicants for Government positions. Senators are importuned daily by numerous individuals for positions in the Government service; and there is no question but what the applications for such service will greatly increase within the next few months. I repeat, as I have heretofore stated to-day, that the obligation rests upon the Democratic Party to reduce in every possible way the expenses of the Government. There will be thousands of demands made upon Congress for appropriations. Meritorious and unmeritorious schemes will be presented, and Congress will be besieged upon all sides for gifts, bonuses, largesses, and appropriations, the granting of a tithe of which would bring national bankruptcy and ruin. Our duty is to set our faces against all demands, except those that can not be avoided, and aid the country by reducing the burden of taxation to the lowest possible degree. If the Democratic Party fails to discharge this high duty, it will be sternly rebuked by the people, in which event the Republicans, perhaps profiting by such default, might attempt to follow a safer path.

I sincerely hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas will be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

The question being put, on a division the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The next committee amendment passed over was, in section 6, page 4, line 25, after the word "clerks," to strike out "of classes 4, 3, 2, and 1" and insert "with salaries at the rate of $1,800, $1,680, $1,560, $1,440, $1,380, $1,320, $1,260, $1,200, $1,140, $1,080, $1,020, $960, and $900; one engineer at $1,200; and two photostat operators, at $1,200 each."

Mr. SMOOT. I withdraw my objection to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment passed over was, in section 6, on page 5, line 13, after the word "clerks," to strike out "of classes 2, 3, and 4" and insert "with salaries at the rate of $1,440 or more per annum."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I see that class 1 is not included in this House provision, and, that being so, I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is agreed to, without objection. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 11, line 18, after the words "by the," to strike out "Secretary of Commerce upon the recommendation of the Director of the Census" and to insert "President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I propose to amend the committee amendment by inserting after the word "appointed," in line 18, page 11, the words "in conformity with the civil-service act and rules," so that it will read:

The supervisors shall be appointed in conformity with the civil-service act and rules.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator from Utah, if he will yield to an interruption, if, under the terms of his amendment to the committee amendment it would mean that the names of the appointees would not come to the Senate at all?

Mr. SMOOT. It would mean that the appointments would be made under the civil-service act and rules. There are only 400 of them, I will say to the Senator from Arizona, but those 400 have some 85,000 enumerators to select; and it does seem to me that, so long as the other employees of the Government are under the civil-service act and are to be selected under that act, the supervisors ought to be placed under that act as well.

Mr. ASHURST. How many supervisors did the Senator from Utah state there will be?

Mr. SMOOT. There will be 400 of them.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish to prolong the discussion on this bill, but this seems to me one of the vital things in the bill. We are from time to time creating new offices, offices that have no responsibility to anybody, and it seems to me, on a matter so important as is this, that these officials should be confirmed by the Senate. The Senate has a right to know who is going to do this work. I was somewhat instrumental in securing the adoption in the committee of the amendment which provides that these appointees shall be confirmed by the Senate. I have not the slightest objection to the Senator's amendment including these employees in the civil service after they have once been confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the President can, without an examination, cover them into the civil service without any act of Congress, and that is just exactly what I do not want him to do.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the very thing I object to. Employees are being covered into the civil service who have no capacity whatever, and there they remain for life, responsible to no constituency, responsible to no man, and not subject to recall.

The Senate from time to time has complained about the aggressions of the Executive power. Incompetent and unreliable men were appointed as judges advocate, and the Senate was not called upon nor permitted to reject or confirm the appointments. I will make the assertion here that in a number of cases had the Senate been called upon to confirm appointees in the Judge Advocate General's Department several of them would have been rejected. So it seems to me that those Senators, especially those upon the other side of the Chamber, who complain that there is constant aggression on the part of the executive department, ought to realize that here is an opportunity to stay the Executive power, to restore the Senate to its proper function, and to give it an opportunity to say whether or not these men are worthy or unworthy.

I hope the Senate will adopt an amendment prohibiting a Senator from making any recommendation in these matters. I hope to escape the burden and the liability—for it is a liability—of making any recommendation; but the Senate ought to know who these appointees are; the Senate has a right to know; and if it is willing that the Executive shall make these dozens upon dozens of appointments without the Senate having a voice in the matter, Senators upon the other side ought to withhold any criticism about Executive domination and about Executive encroachment upon the prerogatives, constitutional rights, and powers of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator accept, then, an amendment of this sort——

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Texas is in charge of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Arizona stated what he was in favor of, and I am simply asking him whether he will accept such an amendment as I am about to suggest——

Mr. ASHURST. I will be glad to hear the suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT. Not that it can bind the chairman of the committee in any way. Would the Senator be agreeable to an amendment so as to make the provision read like this?

The supervisors shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided they shall be selected from persons having passed the civil-service examination.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, that is almost an ideal suggestion. I do not know how the English language could make it any better. That is, to my mind, a most perfect amendment, and so far as I am concerned I am glad to accept it.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be perfectly satisfactory to me if such an amendment as that can be accepted, and I will ask the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge if that amendment is satisfactory to him?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I deem it my duty, Mr. President, to present to the Senate what the director says on this subject. The responsibility of taking the census rests on him, and his views are entitled to consideration. He says that these supervisors serve for only five or six months, and that he does not believe that men of the requisite business capacity and executive ability can be induced to take civil-service examinations and enter the civil-service competition for places of such temporary nature. He makes the following comment:

The selection of supervisors is largely on account of their business capacity; in other words, their business capacity to organize the work and force in a district that usually conforms to the congressional district, to come in contact with enumerators under him, to be able to see that the enumeration is done accurately and well, and then to see that the returns of the enumerators are properly made and transmitted to the Census Office. The personal knowledge of those men by any source that we may resort to is for the purpose of finding that they are men of character, that they have the respect of the community or the district in which they work, and to facilitate the appointment, which is done in that way.

The supervisors have not been selected under the civil-service rules in preceding censuses, but have been appointed in the same manner as they are to be appointed under this proposed law. In justice to the director, who has this work to do, the committee decided to submit the measure as he recommended it and as he believed it to be most practicable, in view not only of his own opinion, but of the position taken by a committee of experts who prepared this bill and many of whom had had practical experience with former censuses. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] was the chief of a division during a former census, and he can give the Senate the benefit of his personal knowledge on this question.

Under all the circumstances, Mr. President, I would not feel justified in accepting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah, but will leave the matter to be decided by the Senate as its judgment may suggest.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not making any assault on the civil service. The first thing we know we are going to have hundreds of thousands—yea, millions—of people drawing salaries out of the Federal Treasury. The taxpayer's back is bending now under the burdens of taxation, and if we keep on and on including people into the civil service, finally we will have one person out of every hundred we meet drawing salaries from the Federal Government, and then we will have, like some of the European Governments, a great horde of officialdom not subject to removal fastened upon the people. There are no terms prescribed when they shall leave a public office; they are there for life; and the longer they are there, frequently the more inefficient they become.

Without intending to reflect upon the civil service at all, I do think there is some philosophy in the suggestion that new blood now and then is a very good thing for official life, but I think the Senate at this time ought to begin—and it should have begun long ago—to insist that those who are going to hold office, perhaps, for a long time ought to be confirmed by the Senate; instead of yielding, we ought to insist upon our prerogatives and our rights and perform our duties under the Constitution. I have no information personally as to how or in what manner the names are selected; indeed, I would prefer that they be sifted through the civil service. Then if they come to us and are objectionable, they can be rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator seems to be under the impression that once in the civil service the Government has to employ them all the time. That is not the case, however. We have just adopted an amendment to this bill directing the Director of the Census to employ people who are not on the permanent rolls now and who have been discharged because of lack of work. That is only giving them a preference; but there are thousands of persons in the United States who have passed the civil-service examination who are not now in the employment of the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Would not these supervisors, though, once on the civil-service list, be eligible for transfer to other departments, provided vacancies exist?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is possibly the point that the Senator from Arizona has in mind—that while this bill does not contemplate their permanent employment, yet by transfer to other permanent bureaus of the Government they may become permanent employees of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if there is no position for them, then they are not employed; but if they want to enter the employment of the Government, and there is a place made for them by vacancy, why not appoint them if they pass the civil-service examination and the President has selected them for this particular place? I see no objection whatever to that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that these men only function for a few months. They are selected largely for their executive ability. They do not themselves go out and make inquiries. They have charge of the selection of a large number of enumerators, and they supervise the work of these enumerators. They must be men of business capacity and judgment, rather than men having technical knowledge along the lines that are frequently prescribed by civil-service examinations; and some of the examinations have no relation whatever to the duties which the men to be selected have to perform. It seems to me just about as sensible to require a civil-service examination of these men as it would be to require a Member of Congress first to take a civil-service examination before he could be eligible to election for Congress. You might get men of a certain class and character; but I believe a requirement such as the Senator suggests here would deprive this important branch of the Government of the services of a large number of valuable men who would not subject themselves to a civil-service examination.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the only reason why they would not subject themselves to a civil-service examination is because they could not pass it; and if they can not pass it, they ought not to be appointed. Now, we either ought to abolish the civil-service law entirely or we ought to live by it. As far as I am personally concerned, I will be satisfied with the action of Congress; but as long as we have the civil-service law on our statute books, we ought to live up to it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. It is not the fault of Congress that the civil-service rules and laws are not obeyed. It is because the favorite of some bureau chief here or there is selected and preferred over some one else, although the selected one does not have the standing and the grade that the one who is passed over has. It is because of the fact that human elements will enter into this situation, just the same as they will elsewhere.

I have never been an enthusiast over the civil service. My objection to the civil service is that it places in office a horde of officials who, as the years glide by, lose initiative, lose the spirit of attack, lose the spirit of bold endeavor, and lose the desire to accomplish anything. Sitting at a desk and watching the clock as the years roll by, the first thing they know they become inefficient. As I said before, if new blood can be infused from time to time into official life, if the civil-service appointees know that there may be a time when they must leave their offices and go out into the world of business and of endeavor and win a living by their own efficiency, they will keep up the high standard of efficiency they have when they come in as new blood.

I am not an enemy of the civil service. In fact, I have no sympathy for those who sneer at it and call it the "snivel service." Grave injustices have been done under it. It has done some good—not as much good, however, as it could do if it were rigidly enforced, as the authors of the law intended some 30 years ago that it should be enforced.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am afraid the same objection that the Senator now makes to those who have taken the civil-service examination applies to the men that enter the Government service at any time. I have stated upon the floor of the Senate a number of times, and I will state again, that no friend of mine by my assistance or recommendation will be given a permanent Government position in Washington if he intends to make his calling and vocation in life a position in one of the departments.

This is what it means, and nothing else: He becomes an absolute machine, and it is only a few years until he loses confidence in his ability to make a living, and he gets settled down in one position, and he spends just the amount of money that he gets from the Government of the United States, and he becomes a dependent. He dares not enter into competition with other men of the country to earn his livelihood; but he thinks: "Well, the Government is a good employer and the monthly pay comes regularly, and I will live within that if I can; and if I can not, I will get accommodated in some other way."

I want to say now that I have seen more good men ruined by being put into a chair in one of the departments than in any other way—men who could have made their mark in this life, men who would have stood high in their profession; but rather than go out and enter competition, rather than to take that starvation period which comes to men, whether he be a business man or whether he be a lawyer or a professional man of any kind, he remains a dependant. He sees a fourth-class clerk in the departments receiving $1,800. He perhaps has no children about him, and he thinks he can live on that salary and live in Washington; and I have heard some of them say that they would rather live in Washington and half starve than live in other places in the United States and have a comfortable living.

I like to see men encouraged who come here for the purpose of securing an education and while going to school earn enough to live on, and I want to see the universities in Washington filled with such young men; but I say now that when a man has received his certificate of graduation from the university the best thing that can happen to him is, as soon as that certificate is issued, to be told to get out and go home and follow the vocation in life that he has previously selected.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I think the Senator has performed a very useful public service. He has graphically and, I think, accurately described what happens to large numbers of men who come here and take positions in the departments. In my judgment the Senator has correctly said that there are men practically buried in the departments here who, were they out measuring wits with other men in the world, would rise to high places in the law, in medicine, in business, in industry, and in other walks of life; but confident, whether rain or shine, whatever happens, that this particular stipend may be depended upon, it does degenerate one, and they lose that bold spirit.

In view of that very statement and argument made by the Senator, with which I thoroughly agree, here are a number of other people that we are going to include in this very class. If these enumerators are included in the civil service, there is another large number, four or five hundred, going into that very class; and there they will remain, because after the census has been taken they have a civil-service status, and they will secure employment somewhere else under the Government, instead of going out into the fields of civil life.

This matter is not vital to me. I did this because over a year ago I made up my mind that hereafter when any new offices are created I shall insist that the Senate shall put its seal of approval or disapproval on the appointees.

So far as the point is concerned about Senators making recommendations I wish Senators were precluded from making recommendations, but limited themselves solely to their constitutional function of voting "yes" or "no" on the appointees after they come in here.

I do not wish to pursue the subject any further. I have said all that I want to say.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we know that if these supervisors are not under the civil service, every political influence that can be brought to bear upon the Director of the Census will be brought to bear upon him to appoint all of them from one political party. There is no question at all about it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah further yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. SMOOT. Just as soon as I conclude I will yield. Then, when those 400 supervisors are appointed, they have the selection of 85,000 enumerators, and we all know exactly what that means.

As I said before, I think that if we are going to have a civil-service law upon the statute books we ought to live up to it, and if not we ought to repeal it; and therefore I feel just like the Civil Service Reform League feel in relation to this matter. Let me read to the Senator what they say:

> The league is very glad to see this change—

That is, of the 4,000 clerks that are provided for—> which is made substantially as urged by us before your committee. There remains, however, one very serious defect in the bill. I refer to the method of employment of the 400 supervisors who will select the 85,000 enumerators. In the original bill these supervisors were to be selected by the Director of the Census and appointed by the Secretary of Commerce.

And I want to say here that I approve the Senate committee amendment as against the House provision.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator does think the Senate committee amendment is some improvement over the House provision?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

> In the bill as now reported—

That means as reported to the Senate—

> the appointments are to be made by the President and confirmed by the Senate. This is the procedure followed in previous censuses. It is quite certain that under this system of appointment the actual selection of enumerators will be guided by political considerations, as in the past.

And I will say to the Senator that the appointments have always been along political lines.

> Now that the war is over it can no longer be argued that the Civil Service Commission is too busy with other work to establish registers of eligible persons for appointment as supervisors. If these appointments are made impartially, without reference to politics, then the 85,000 enumerators chosen by the supervisors are likely to be appointed impartially, and the country will be spared a repetition of past scandals.

Mr. President, I think I have said enough upon this point. Every Senator knows just what it means, and all I want is a record vote upon it. If the chairman of the committee does not wish to accept the amendment as I last proposed it, in conformity with the suggestion made by the Senator from Arizona, then I shall want the vote upon the original amendment as I offered it. In other words, Mr. President, it will then read as follows:

> The supervisors shall be appointed in conformity with the civil-service act and rules.

I offer that as a substitute for the committee amendment. I should like to have the yeas and nays upon the substitute, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Utah. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MARTIN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER (when Mr. SWANSON's name was called). I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I am informed that he has not voted. I therefore transfer my pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "yea."

Mr. CALDER. Is the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] recorded as voting?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. CALDER. I have a pair with that Senator and withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and vote "nay."

Mr. KNOX. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is unavoidably absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. PENROSE (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I notice that he has not voted, but I feel justified in permitting my vote to stand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will permit the pair to stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pair stands as already announced.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

So Mr. SMOOT's amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I call attention to the fact that the words "by the" in line 18 should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the words "by the" on page 11, line 18, after the word "appointed," will be stricken out. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer an amendment on page 9——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend a moment, until he finds out what the parliamentary situation is. The Chair will ask the Senator from Utah to state his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. When I asked to strike out the words "by the" I was led to believe that the amendment that was offered by myself had been disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was agreed to, and the Chair so announced.

Mr. SMOOT. As that amendment was agreed to, the words "by the" should not be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the words "by the" were stricken out.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment striking out the words "by the" will be rejected. Now, will the Senator from Utah restate his amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. I will read the provision as it will stand:

The supervisors shall be appointed in conformity with the civil-service law and rules by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided, That they shall be selected from persons who have passed the civil-service examination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the statement of the amendment as it has been agreed to. There seems to be no objection to its correctness, and it is the amendment agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I give notice that I shall ask for a separate vote on this amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Notice is given that a separate vote will be asked on the amendment in the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee, because I am quite sure he will have no objection to the amendment which I shall propose.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. GRONNA. On page 9, line 19, after the word "crops," I move to insert a comma and the words "and the cost of producing such crops."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee, I think he will accept the amendment which I shall propose. On page 8, line 22, after the word "population," I move to add the words "to the distribution of wealth."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is one amendment further that I wish to move. After the word "home," in line 10, page 9, I move to insert the words "and the encumbrance thereon," so that it will correspond to the phraseology in the paragraph immediately following it with respect to farms.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEW. Are general amendments now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendments have been disposed of and general amendments are in order.

Mr. NEW. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of section 6 after the word "provided" in line 18, page 5, and insert:

That after the passage of this act preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and widows of such, in making appointments to clerical and other positions in the executive departments and in independent Government establishments.

Mr. NEW. Does the Senator from Texas accept the amendment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question with regard to the salaries of the statisticians in the Census Office. There is now in the Census Office an employee known as the chief statistician or Chief of the Bureau of Vital Statistics, is there not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. There are five statistical experts in the Census Office at present. The only effect of the bill is to add one other chief statistician. Does the Senator have reference to chief statisticians?

Mr. CUMMINS. The bill provides that three of the chief statisticians shall receive a salary of $4,000 a year and that three of them shall receive a salary of $3,000 per year. Why does the committee discriminate as between these statisticians?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Because the three who receive the larger salary are at the head of three great divisions of the Census Office, population, manufactures, and agriculture, respectively, and the other three have duties that are not so important.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is there any greater or more important division in the Census Office than the one which has charge of the vital statistics of the Nation?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think so, because the work of vital statistics goes on from year to year and is not as extensive as is the work of the chief statisticians of the three great divisions during the decennial-census period. The increases referred to are only for the three years of the decennial-census period.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is quite enough to occupy the attention of one man. No matter when he performs his work, he is at work all the time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. But the special labor involved in the work of the three-year period has very much increased. I shall give the Senator the number of employees who will be under the statisticians of population, manufactures, and agriculture during the decennial-census period. The statistician of the Division of Population will have under his jurisdiction about 1,800 employees, the chief statistician of the Division of Agriculture about 1,000 employees, and the statistician of the Division of Manufactures about 500 employees. Each of these divisions is much larger than many of the bureaus of the Government service, and it will be necessary to have in charge of them men of strong executive and administrative ability.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think the salary one receives should depend entirely upon the number of subordinate employees in his bureau.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is only one indication of the increased duties during the decennial-census period.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that the amendment which was offered by the committee has been already passed on.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It has been passed upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. Unless it is reconsidered, I shall feel it my duty to reserve it for a separate vote in the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator can offer an amendment in the Senate on the subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know anything about the specific work of the other two statisticians to whom I am referring, but I do know something about the work of the chief statistician in the Division of Vital Statistics, and I think the adjustment here is a grave and unwarrantable discrimination against that particular employee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall say to the Senator that the census which will be taken next year will not cover vital statistics. Vital statistics are provided for in the permanent-census act, and they are taken periodically and independently of the decennial census. They only apply to the registration area of the United States, and only a comparatively small number of States have official registration. The taking of vital statistics is confined to that area, and continues as a permanent thing, whereas these increases of salary apply merely to the work of the three statisticians in connection with the Fourteenth decennial census, which continues for a period of only three years. The salaries go back to what they are as a permanent thing at the end of three years.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that; but I assume you have attached salaries to the various places because they are commensurate to the volume of work performed?

Mr. SHEPPARD. On account of the increase in the work during the three years of the decennial census. There is no special increase in the work in vital statistics.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me if that work is properly taken care of in the law there will be an increase in the labors of that office, for vital statistics are of growing importance in this country.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not as a part of the decennial census work.

Mr. CUMMINS. They are the foundation for practically all our social and industrial legislation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is entirely true; but they are not a part of the coming decennial census.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is intended that the work shall be done in 1920, is it not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Quite true.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Chief of the Division of Vital Statistics should have a salary of $4,000 per year, and I move to amend the bill, if the Senator will permit this to be done without a reconsideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to amend is not in order without a motion to reconsider.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is it the intention of the Senator from Iowa to substitute $4,000 for $3,000 in line 13?

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply want to offer an amendment which will increase the salary of the chief statistician of vital statistics to $4,000 per year.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the amendment be reconsidered in order that the Senator from Iowa may offer the amendment he has in mind.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move, in line 13, page 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out the word "three" and substitute "four" in its stead.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I accept the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then, after the word "statisticians," in the same line, I move that there be inserted the words "including the chief statistician of the Bureau of Vital Statistics."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The chairman of the committee accepts the amendment as proposed. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FRANCE. I understand that the committee amendments have been disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have been disposed of. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to offer several amendments to the bill, and as the amendments, while they are quite numerous, really constitute one amendment, I desire that they shall be read at the desk together without reference to the parts of the bill to which they apply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendments.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the title and wherever it occurs in the bill strike out the word "decennial" and insert in lieu thereof the word "quinquennial."

On page 1, strike out all of line 1 to line 2 on page 2, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Be it enacted, etc., That a census and survey of the population of the United States and of its colonies and of the education, health, insurance, agriculture, manufacture, forestry and forest products, mines and quarries of the people of the United States and of its colonies shall be taken by the Director of the Census, beginning in the year 1920, and every five years thereafter: Provided, however, That the making of the census, registration, and schedule of inquiries relating to population shall be continuous, as hereinafter provided.

"The census herein provided for shall include each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, Guam, and Samoa, said census to be made in accordance with such plans and regulations as the Director of the Census may prescribe in pursuance of the provisions of this act."

On page 2 strike out all of section 2 and substitute therefor the following:

"SEC. 2. That the period of three years, beginning the 1st day of July next preceding the census provided for in section 1 of this act, shall be known as the quinquennial census period, and the reports upon the inquiries provided for in said section shall be completed and published within such period: Provided, however, That the registration of the population and the schedule of inquiries relating thereto shall be commenced on or before the 1st day of July, 1919, and shall thereafter be continuous, and the results of the same shall be continually recorded and shall be from time to time compiled and analyzed, and useful statistics based thereupon published, as the public interest may require, but at intervals of not longer than five years: Provided, however, That information identifying any particular individual or firm shall not be published but shall be held in confidence: Provided, however, That lists of all citizens over 21 years of age, arranged and divided into sections according to election precincts, districts, counties, congressional districts, and States, which lists shall contain information as to the race, sex, occupation, and residence of each such inhabitant over 21 years of age, shall be published on or before the 1st day of July in each year, such lists to be known as the "official Federal registration lists," and to be printed for distribution in sections as described at such reasonable prices as may be determined upon by the Director of the Census."

On pages 8, 9, 10, and 11 strike out all of section 8 and substitute therefor the following:

"Sec. 8. That the Fourteenth Census shall be restricted to inquiries relating to the education, health, insurance, agriculture, manufacture, forestry and forestry products, mines and quarries of the people of the United States and the colonies, and to the population of the United States and its colonies.

"The survey and schedules of inquiries and the records relating to population shall be so made as to furnish continuing records of each inhabitant, which records shall be kept by complete card system, in duplicate, one set of records to be filed in the census office of the local subdivision and one set to be filed in the office of the Bureau of Census in Washington when it shall be called for. Such continuous survey and records of the inhabitants of the United States shall be so made as to furnish an accurate schedule of vital, educational, and industrial statistics as a basis for the formulation of legislation to promote the general welfare, defense, and safety by improving the vital, educational, and industrial condition of the inhabitants, and such survey and records shall include specifically and in detail for each and every inhabitant, the place and date of birth; acute and chronic contagious diseases; occupational diseases and accidents; school attendance and progress; business or vocational training; military training or service and wounds or disabilities contracted in service; high-school, college, or technical training; health and physical condition; the health and physical condition of all school children under 14 years of age, and of all males under 45 years of age, as ascertained by an annual medical examination; place, character, sanitation, and tenure of abode; relationship to head of the family; color; sex; age; conjugal condition; occupation; condition of employment or unemployment; registration in Federal employment agency; whether employer or employee; trade; business; public offices, honors or special achievements; payment of taxation or insurance premiums; whether qualified and habitually exercising suffrage rights in State and Federal elections; place of birth of parents, nationality, and mother tongue, and knowledge of English if born in a foreign country; nationality, mother tongue, and knowledge of English of parents of foreign birth, and number of years in the United States; literacy; and the date, place, and cause of death; and such schedules shall also include a survey of the almshouses, charitable agencies, and complete and partion pauperism in the United States.

"The survey of and schedule of inquiry relating to education shall be so made as to secure such definite and classified information as might be useful as a basis for the formulation of legislation for the establishment of a Federal department of public education and for the standardization and extension, with the aid of the Federal Government, of all of the agencies of public instruction and for the establishment of a federalized system of free public education and training extending from the elementary schools to and including technical schools, colleges, universities, and professional schools with vocational and rehabilitation schools as well as night schools for adults and immigrants, compulsory in its elementary but optional for and equally available to all in its higher departments; and such schedule of inquiry shall include a survey of the number, character, cost, and value of city and rural public-school buildings for the white and racial groups; of private, technical, and rehabilitation schools; of colleges, universities, and professional schools; salaries of teachers and the total annual cost of maintenance; the total number of children of school age; the number enrolled, the number in regular attendance, and the length of the school year; sanitary conditions; character of curricula and physical and mental training; tuition and living costs in private schools and colleges; and the possible availability of private institutions, schools, and colleges for acquisition for future or continued use as parts of a public system of education.

tution due to preventable injury, death, and inadequate insurance, and such schedule of inquiry shall include a survey and tabulation of vital statistics and of the health of the population as reported by the population registration records heretofore provided for; also a survey of public and private health bureaus or agencies; of public and private hospitals and sanitoria for general or special diseases; of contagious and industrial diseases; of industrial accidents; safety devices, sanitary precautions, morbidity and mortality in the dangerous and dusty trades; of tenements and insanitary housing conditions; of employers' liability laws, and of systems in force of health, old-age, accident, or other forms of insurance, with cost of same and the distribution and number of those insured: And provided, That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission on education of three members and a commission on public health, vital statistics, and insurance of three members to advise with the Director of the Census as to the most efficient methods of collecting and classifying data relating to these subjects, and each member of said commissions may be granted a salary at the rate of $5,000 per annum for the term of his service, which shall not exceed three years.

"The schedules relating to agriculture shall include name, color, sex, and country of birth of occupant of each farm, tenure, acreage of farm, acreage of woodland, value of farm and improvements, and the encumbrance thereon, sanitary condition, value of farm implements, number and breeding of live stock on farms, ranges, and elsewhere, and the acreage of crops and the number working, including family, in crop production, and the net and gross income, the quantities and cost, including value of the labor of farmer and family, of crops and other farm products for the year ending December 31 next preceding the enumeration. "The census of manufactures and of mines and quarries shall relate to the year ending December 31, next preceding the enumeration of population, and shall be confined to manufacturing establishments and mines and quarries which were in active operation during all or a portion of that year. The census of manufactures shall furthermore be confined to manufacturing establishments conducted under what is known as a factory system, exclusive of the so-called neighborhood, household, and hand industries.

"The form and subdivision of inquiries necessary to obtain the information under the foregoing topics shall be determined by the Director of the Census.

"Whenever he shall deem it expedient the Director of the Census may charge the collection of these statistics upon special agents or upon detailed employees to be employed without respect to locality."

On pages 11 and 12, strike out all of section 9 and substitute therefor the following:

"SEC. 9. That the Director of the Census, at least six months prior to the date fixed for commencing the schedules of inquiries and the enumeration as herein provided, shall designate the number, whether one or more, of supervisors of census for each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, Guam, and Samoa, or special agents as hereinafter provided, and shall define the various census districts, census subdivisions of the census districts, and the census precincts in which they are to act: Provided, That the supervisors of the census shall be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided further, That so far as possible the boundaries of the census districts shall conform to the boundaries of congressional districts, and the boundaries of the various census subdivisions shall conform to the political subdivisions of the States or colonies, such as counties, cities, or legislative districts, and that the census precincts shall conform to the election precincts of such political subdivisions: And provided further, That, if in any supervisor's census district the supervisor has not been appointed and qualified 90 days preceding the date fixed for the survey and enumeration, or if any vacancy shall occur, either through death, removal, resignation, or from any other cause, the President may appoint a temporary supervisor or director of the census district or the Director of the Census may detail any employee of the Census Office to act as a supervisor of the district: And provided further, That each supervisor of the census shall select, with the approval and consent of the Director of the Census, a suitable office in each of the census precincts of each of the various census subdivisions of each of said census districts, to be created as heretofore provided, to which office on census enumeration days, which shall be duly specified and publicly proclaimed by the President, all of the inhabitants of said census precinct shall come either in person or through the head of the family, parent, teacher, or head of the firm by which he may be employed, to be enrolled and to receive a numbered registration card: And provided further, That the supervisor of the district shall, with the approval and consent of the Director of the Census, also select suitable central offices for each census subdivision corresponding to either city, county, or legislative district, if possible at the county seat or at some other central point where there shall be provided, until a suitable Federal building shall be erected, as may hereafter be provided by law, rooms and facilities for the study, tabulation, classification, and safekeeping of all record cards containing vital statistics and other information provided by the schedules of inquiry: And provided further, That such central offices shall also be utilized for the accommodation of the subdivision branch of the Federal Department of Public Health, Vital Statistics, and Insurance; of the subdivision branch of the Federal Department of Education, and of the subdivision branch of the Federal Employment Bureau when and if these shall be authorized and created by Federal statutes. On pages 12 and 13, strike out all of section 10 and substitute in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 10. That the Director of the Census shall also direct that inquiries shall be made through the supervisors of the various census districts and through the assistant supervisors of various census subdivisions as to the best available site in each census subdivision, in the town or city where the central offices of the census subdivision shall be located, for the erection of a Federal building for the permanent accommodation of the census subdivision offices, for the safe-keeping of records, and for the permanent housing of the subdivision branches of the Federal Departments of Education, of Health, Vital Statistics, and Insurance, of the Federal Employment Bureau, Agricultural Extension Services, and of the Post Office; and whether the local authorities or agencies will provide the site or what would be the price of the same, such site to be suitable for the erection of a building either by the Federal Government alone or in conjunction with the local authorities, which building shall be suitable for the aforesaid uses, with fireproof files for the population records, rooms and laboratories for physical examinations, rooms for corrective physical treatments, assembly hall, a library of United States bulletins and publications, the vocational or rehabilitation school, facilities for a Federal community center or such other activities as will best promote the Federal and local needs: Provided, That the results of these inquiries shall be tabulated and submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate for consideration by that committee: Provided further, That each supervisor of census shall be charged with the performance within his own district of the following duties: To consult with the Director of the Census in regard to the division of his district into subdivisions most convenient for the purpose of enumeration, which subdivisions or enumeration districts shall be defined and the boundaries thereof fixed by the Director of the Census as heretofore provided; to designate to the director suitable persons, and with his consent to employ such persons as enumerators, one or more for each precinct and subdivision; to communicate to enumerators the necessary instructions and directions relating to their duties; to examine and scrutinize the returns of the enumerators, and in the event of discrepancies or deficiencies appearing in any of the said returns to use all diligence in causing the same to be corrected or supplied; to forward the completed returns of the enumerators to the director at such time and in such manner as shall be prescribed; and to make up and forward to the director the accounts of each enumerator in his district for service rendered, which accounts shall be duly certified to by the enumerator, and the same shall be certified as true and correct if so found by the supervisor, and said accounts so certified shall be accepted and paid by the director.

"The duties imposed upon the supervisor by this act shall be performed in any and all particulars in accordance with the orders and instructions of the Director of the Census."

Mr. FRANCE addressed the Senate. After having spoken with interruptions for two hours and a quarter,

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Will the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the Senator is willing to suspend now we will take a recess so that he can go on to-morrow, as it may suit his convenience.

Mr. FRANCE. I will be very glad to suspend, because I could not possibly finish this evening. In fact, I have hardly touched upon the general subjects which I desire to discuss. These remarks have only been made in a most preliminary way, although I have consumed a considerable amount of time. I will be very glad to yield now.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Will the Senator from Texas withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

DEMOBILIZATION OF AMERICAN TROOPS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, yesterday in discussing the subject of demobilization some question was raised as to the attitude of the administration. I had not at the time I made my remarks seen the Washington Times newspaper of January 14. I have it before me now, and I will read this extract from it:

PRESIDENT TELLS PEACE DELEGATES AMERICAN TROOPS MUST GO HOME—ALLIES' PLAN TO KEEP YANKS AS POLICEMEN IS OPPOSED.

PARIS, January 14.

The outstanding feature of the allied peace conferences to-day was the announcement by President Wilson to the delegates that American troops must be sent home from Europe without delay.

It is learned that the imperativeness of returning the Yanks to the United States as quickly as possible was strongly emphasized by the President, who wants the fighters to be enabled to resume normal peace-time occupations at the earliest possible moment.

I am delighted to know that the President's views on this subject and mine seem to be apparently the same.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I merely wish to call attention to the fact that that is just a part of some of the recent expressions of the President of the United States and not an expression of his entire purpose.

RECESS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas that a recess be taken until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, January 16, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 15, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Come Thou, Almighty Father, with all Thy power and holy influence, and help us and all the world to extricate ourselves from the tangled web which we have woven about us.

The war presumably is over and we are striving to reconstruct the world into a permanent peace. Remind us, we beseech Thee, that reconstruction begins at home.

Help us to look into our own hearts with a view of reconstructing ourselves. Thou hast made clear the way, but we are strangely forgetful and fail to follow the straight and narrow way, which is life eternal.

Give us the will, the determination, to cast out satan, which is selfishness, and follow the golden rule, the panacea for all the ills that beset us, and the world will reconstruct itself. Peace will be permanent and every home, every nation, will enjoy the fruits of their own labors and the world become a paradise. In Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I present herewith a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That clerks to committees of the House during the session provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, be, and they are hereby, assigned for the present session of Congress to the following committees, to wit: Committee on Education, Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, Committee on Invalid Pensions (assistant clerk), Committee on Enrolled Bills (assistant clerk), Committee on the Judiciary, Committee on Woman Suffrage."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, the House will recall that a few days ago the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] reported this and the resolution that I assume will be taken up next in order, and at that time I opposed the resolution and asked the gentleman to withdraw it upon the ground that through an error I had not been notified of the meeting of the committee. The committee has now met and has gone with some care into each one of these questions. As a result of our deliberations, and after hearing the chairmen of the several committees, we have stricken out the Committee on Railways and Canals, the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, and the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service from this resolution.

Mr. HASTINGS. And we have added the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. SANFORD. And have added the Committee on Woman Suffrage. In the other resolution we have stricken out about half of the committees. I would not have the House for a moment think that this is wholly a satisfactory method of dealing with this kind of business, but so far as I have been able to see we have taken the only course that is open to us. I have stood for the proposition that any person who asks from this Committee on Accounts for the disbursement of public money should come before the committee and tell his reason. With reference to this particular question I have asked that the chairman shall first say to this committee that in his judgment the proposition calls for a wise disbursement of public money, and that he favors it, and then I have required that he give some reasons to substantiate his judgment. I have not seen fit to go any further than that. The committees that have been stricken from both of these resolutions are the committees where the chairmen have not been able to make that statement.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Gladly.

Mr. MANN. How has the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service been provided with a clerk until now?

Mr. SANFORD. That is not in this resolution.

Mr. HASTINGS. It is not provided except that we provide for it in this resolution.

Mr. MANN. I thought it was proposed to strike that out.

Mr. HASTINGS. That would leave that committee without any clerk at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the revised form the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service is provided with a clerk.

Mr. SANFORD. My memorandum is that the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service is provided with a clerk.

Mr. HASTINGS. We strike out the Committee on Railways and Canals and the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic and substitute the Committee on Woman Suffrage and the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that they had taken out the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Mr. SANFORD. In saying so I think I followed a prompting that was made to me, but my memorandum shows that the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service is taken care of in this resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am informed by a member of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service that it has not met during this entire Congress. What is the need of providing for a clerk in the closing days, except, perhaps, to wind up the business of that important committee?

The SPEAKER. The Civil Service Committee is in the amendment.

Mr. SANFORD. I am unable to answer that question. My position is this: If the chairman of a committee, of a standing committee of this House, comes before our committee and says that, in his judgment, the public work that is intrusted to him can not be done without this assistance and then gives the reasons, I feel that, as a Member of the House, I am bound by his judgment, because the functions that, under the rules, are placed on these several committees are vital and important functions. I know that in many cases the functions are not performed. I know that in a majority of the cases these committees on expenditures do not do any work at all, but in some cases they do do work. In any event, they have very important duties.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take, for instance, the once very important Committee on Woman Suffrage. We have passed all the legislation possible that can be conceived on that question, and now we are asked by a gentleman, who is a very busy Member of this Congress, for a committee clerk. What is the reason advanced by the chairman of that committee that he should desire the aid of a clerk in these closing days of the term?

Mr. SANFORD. I would like to have the gentleman know that I struggled very patiently and tried to persuade the chairman of the Committee on Woman Suffrage that the work of that committee was long since done. I opposed this provision, but the chairman of the committee was very serious and said that his correspondence was very extensive, and that the work before it is very vital. I could not quite understand it, but he was a very responsible person intrusted with a very responsible position, and I felt in his case that I was bound by his judgment.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I will.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to call the attention of the gentlemen of the House to the fact that at the time the Woman Suffrage Committee was created, and in the hearings at that time of the creation, it was agreed by those who were interested or promised by those who were interested in the creation of that committee that when the legislation had passed the House there would be no longer need of the Committee on Woman Suffrage, and it would not be longer continued.

Mr. SANFORD. And that situation is with the House. It is for the House to decide, but it is my opinion that we should no more have that committee than a committee on men suffrage. I am very glad to see anybody who is enthusiastic to help the women of the country along, but to have a committee of this kind on woman suffrage when it has wound up all it can do is ridiculous, but it exists by virtue of the judgment and action of the House.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. Does this provide for a clerk to this committee for the term of six or eight weeks?

Mr. SANFORD. In this resolution.

Mr. GILLETT. It is not to July 1?

Mr. SANFORD. No.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to say on behalf of the Committee on Accounts that the chairman of these several committees appeared before the committee and made statements. Now, in reference to this Committee on Woman Suffrage I do not think there is any more important committee of the House. It is a very live question throughout the United States and throughout the several States. The chairman of the committee appeared before us and stated that a vast amount of correspondence is before that committee upon this subject, and I am sure that Members of Congress understand that this being a live subject that there is a vast amount of correspondence coming, of course, to the committee and that a clerk to the committee is needed. It is only a session clerk and expires with the end of this Congress on the 4th of March next, and the committee, after hearing the statement made by the chairman, agreed favorably to report this resolution with this amendment, and we believe it ought to pass.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I will.

Mr. GARD. I have a very high regard for the gentleman's work on this somewhat troublesome committee and also for his candid and impartial expression of his views. Will the gentleman state whether in his opinion any of these clerkships are needed at this session in either of these resolutions?

Mr. SANFORD. In answer to the gentleman I should like to say I have very great doubt whether any of them are needed at all or not, but I have felt that the Committee on Accounts is bound by the judgment of the men who have duties imposed upon them under the rules of the House, and that if they come before us and tell us that those duties can not be performed without a clerk I feel I am bound by their judgment. The one thing which I want to impress, however, with reference to this at this time is this, that I felt and feel now that the House should protect this committee to the extent of supporting it in striking out these committees where the chairman is not able to come and make a statement I want to see the House get a little confidence in the method by which the committee is now proceeding.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I will.

Mr. GARNER. I am very anxious the House should get more confidence in the Committee on Accounts myself, but I think the method the gentleman has adopted, and he is very frank with the House, will cause them to lose some confidence in it; that if you simply go and take the statement of a man about the need of a clerk, and you are not going to investigate yourself and ascertain definite knowledge of whether he needs the clerk, I am afraid you will not have the confidence of the House which you ought to have.

Mr. SANFORD. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] misunderstands my statement. I say that I want the House to have confidence in the method of exclusion which I have adopted. I do not care whether the House adopts the resolution for any of these committees or not; but I say the thing we are doing now is so much better than anything we have done before that I think the House ought not to put in this resolution any provision in favor of any man who has not the courage to come or has not seen the necessity of coming and stating the facts on which he makes his claim.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand from the statement of the gentleman and the gentleman proposing the resolution that it was the intention of the committee to provide merely session clerks for these committees?

Mr. SANFORD. Under the pending resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. This resolution assigns to certain committees the clerks provided for in the legislative bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Ah, will the gentleman permit me? There are no clerks provided for this committee in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1919. The gentleman is under an error in so proceeding. There is no clerk provided for the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Mr. SANFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. GARNER. There are some clerks provided for.

Mr. SANFORD. I say that the legislative bill provides a certain number of clerks, to the number of eight. The legislative bill provides for eight clerks without assigning them to any definite committees.

Mr. GARNER. And you are undertaking to assign them here?

Mr. SANFORD. It is the function of the Accounts Committee to assign them to certain committees.

Mr. SNELL. Is there any evidence to show about the clerk for the Committee on Railways and Canals?

Mr. SANFORD. That was stricken out.

Mr. SNELL. I was on that committee two years, and I never found the door open. I wondered what they did.

Mr. SANFORD. That explains the situation. I do feel that I would like to relieve my own conscience by saying to the House about this subject that I have found, from day to day and from week to week in the work of this committee, hidden under the cloak of this sort of legislation and this sort of procedure lots of things that I would not want to talk about in public—things I know the House would not stand for. When conditions of this kind exist men act as they would not act if they were really confronted with the nature of the thing they were doing. I have found that these different authorities for the creation of patronage are used for private and political gain of one kind and another. There is none of it very important, because there is none of it big. It is all little. But little as it is, it seems to enter into the relationships in the House and poison them and contaminate them. I think we can cure this situation to some extent if we will simply insist that men talk about the thing they want to do; tell the thing they want to do.

I have found, for instance, under all the old precedents here that some of these committee clerkships have been taken and given to individual Members of the House who were not on the committees at all; that is, a gentleman getting the right to appoint a clerk under one of these resolutions at $6 a day takes that clerkship and gives it under the direction of some person of authority to some other person, because persons in authority want to reward or help that other person. Now, that is absolutely unjustifiable. That thing has been done under circumstances where it would seem on the surface as if it were done to influence important and vital action in this House. It is done by persons of influence and authority, who perhaps at the time they did it did not understand, perhaps did not give consideration enough to it to realize, the enormity and the moral turpitude of the thing they were doing. These clerkships have been assigned to individual Members for their private and personal use, when no person would have had the temerity to say publicly or to say in the House that there ever was such intention. On the other hand, in this House to-day there are men who by reason of their prominence in national legislation have been confronted with great tasks to perform, and who by reason of their position on this committee or that committee are carrying great burdens, and because of that the business they have to do in their offices has so greatly increased that they are unable to cope with the situation, and they are hiring clerks out of their own pockets. I sometimes think that the House, if it knew the situation with reference to some of these very prominent and capable and busy Members of the House, might be inclined to help the situation out. But I am sure the House would never intentionally authorize the practices that have prevailed in the distribution of patronage.

When I first came on the committee, the committee acted wholly on precedent. It would be said, "There is precedent for this thing; this thing has been done for 20 years"; and if anybody would say that this thing had always been done it would go. And that is where the danger was. Precedent never justifies the expenditure of money. And however little this thing is apparently on its face, because these resolutions only involve a couple of thousands of dollars a month, nevertheless I am anxious to persuade the House to this point of view for the reasons I have indicated.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] five minutes. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman started in with an hour and has used 20 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have taken seriously the appointment of myself on various committees. I believe there are important duties to be performed, and I have attempted to perform them. The only criticism I have received is that I am too active and have asked for too much here and there.

I thought when a man was appointed on a committee it was his duty to do the work of that committee, and the duty of the House to furnish the committee with the necessary clerical assistance and material with which to do the work. The House graciously appointed me on the Committee on the Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and I acted as chairman for six months. I was given no secretary and was told by the House that I should do no work. Notwithstanding that, I gathered a lot of data and information in order that I might judiciously perform my duties as chairman if I was continued upon that committee. There was work that the House ought to have had done. That committee has important functions to perform, as do all of the committees on expenditures in the various departments if they would but do their duty to the House and the country. They could be busy two-thirds of the time, particularly when the Members are not members of other committees. On the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice in particular they should look into the question of the expenditures of that department and its various agents as to what has been done regarding the expenditures in the various penitentiaries, the expenditures of United States clerks of courts, district attorneys, and marshals. The duty of that committee is to take that work up, and I was trying to do that.

Now, when the House determined upon a Committee on Woman Suffrage and I was again given an honor—and I take it to be an honor to be the chairman of that committee—I took up the responsibility of that committee, not only to the House but to the country, and I have tried to do my work and have the committee do its work. We have been doing work—active work—and when a bill is passed through the House that fact is no sign that it is the duty of the committee to cease its work. It is the duty of the committee to push it along and see that it is enacted, if it can get through, if it is proper legislation. There is hardly a day when the secretary of that committee is not at work on correspondence and in personal communication, by telephone and otherwise, with those who favor a constitutional amendment giving the right of suffrage to women.

This committee authorized me to employ a clerk—the same one we had before—and a meeting has been called for Monday, and a hearing is to be had, and I deem it my duty to see to it that the things that belong to that committee are attended to. Merely because some one is opposed to woman suffrage is to me no reason why I should cease to do my work. When we are fighting for democracy abroad and spending over $35,000,000,000 we at home are refusing to extend the same right of democracy to over half of our population, who are begging and pleading for it. The members of the committee are ready and willing to give their time and perform their duty and see to it that the committee is called together, and no member on that committee can say that committee meetings have not been called or that the clerk has not been attentive and is not necessary. I do not believe that we should ask the House to do something that does not belong to proper legislative functions. There are some committees that have a great deal of work to do; and if those who have charge of them would not try to gather before their committees all the important functions that belong to other committees less important those other committees will perform the duties that are placed upon them. If they will do it, they will have their hands full. They have got the chance to have their secretary and their experts do the work that they ought to do.

It is one of the things that this House attempted to do eight years ago, and it is one of the things that you Republicans will attempt to do when the Democrats have turned over the administration of this House to you. You will make an investigation of the executive departments. But you should make an investigation now by your Democratic committees, and let them go to work; and if anything wrong is shown up you can bring in legislation to correct it and not wait until two years from now. Do your duty as it is done now in every county and State in this Union, where they examine into the facts to see whether the public money is properly expended, and enforce the law and see that it is properly expended, and if a correction is to be made, make the correction. Because a man comes here for a year or two and gets on a small committee is that any reason why he should quit and lie down and do nothing?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to have two or three minutes more.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. RAKER. I realize that we are taking up the time of the Committee on Appropriations. But yesterday we agreed to dispense with the proceedings in order to-day, and we have done that for a month, putting aside Calendar Wednesday and other matters. I do not want to take up the time of the House unduly, but I believe it is unfair and unjust to criticize small committees because they are trying to do their duty and perform their work. I think it is unfair to criticize a man and try to belittle him because he is on a small committee and not on the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Ways and Means or the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Naval Affairs. That ought not to be the spirit of any man in this House. A man if he is on a small committee to-day, if he is attending to his duties and giving proper service to the House and to his constituency, will be appreciated by his constituency and he will be enabled to demonstrate that he is worthy of going on further. That has been the history of this country for a hundred years, and will continue to be the history of this country until the end. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the amendment. I move the previous question.

Mr. LITTLE. Can I have two minutes?

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman can speak on the next resolution.

Mr. LITTLE. Will not the gentleman yield me just two minutes?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. I just want to say this: I am on that committee, and I see in this list three committees, all of which put together do not do as much work as is done by this single Committee on Woman Suffrage. I think the House ought to be fair with us. Those people receive a stack of correspondence that will keep a clerk busy from now until the 4th of March. The young lady who is acting as clerk has been doing the work of that committee since November, and she should be paid for it, and the people in the country who write about this woman-suffrage amendment to the Constitution should have answers given to their letters. What subject before Congress is more worthy of consideration than this? I think this committee should have a clerk and the clerk should be paid like other clerks of committees. It is an important committee.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, let the amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 460, as it will read when amended:

"Resolved, That clerks to committees of the House during the session provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, be, and they are hereby, assigned for the present session of Congress to the following committees, to wit: Committee on Education; Committee on Reform in the Civil Service; Committee on Invalid Pensions, assistant clerk; Committee on the Judiciary, additional assistant clerk; Committee on Enrolled Bills, assistant clerk; Committee on Woman Suffrage."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BOOHER, indefinitely, on account of illness.

SESSION CLERKS TO VARIOUS COMMITTEES.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I send up another privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that purpose, provided he will agree that if there is a row about it he will withdraw the resolution.

Mr. HASTINGS. I will. I promised the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] that I would do so.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 468.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Interior, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Labor, the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds each be allowed a clerk at the rate of $125 per month during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, beginning December 2, 1918; that the Committee on Enrolled Bills be allowed a clerk, at the rate of $6 per diem, during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, beginning the 2d day of December, 1918; that the Committee on Rules be allowed an assistant clerk, at the rate of $100 per month, during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, beginning the 2d day of December, 1918. Salaries of said clerks to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HASTINGS. There is an amendment contained in the report eliminating a number of these committees.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts report the following substitute resolution:

"Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House for the services of a clerk to each of the committees designated herein compensation at the rate of $125 per month during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, beginning December 2, 1918: Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Labor, Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department; that the Committee on Rules be allowed an assistant clerk, at the rate of $100 per month, during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, beginning on the 2d day of December, 1918."

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. CALDWELL. The Committees on Expenditures in the War and Navy Departments were purposely left out, were they?

Mr. HASTINGS. They were purposely left out. The chairmen of these several committees were sent for, and the chairmen of these two committees did not appear. We allowed clerks only where representatives of the committees appeared before the Committee on Accounts and where, after investigation, the Committee on Accounts found that there were bills or other matters pending before the committees that justified the allowance of clerks.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. I notice that in the amendment offered the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department is left out. The chairman of that committee did not appear before the Committee on Accounts. I am not certain that he was requested to appear, but at any rate he would not have appeared, for the reason that that committee does not expect to have any meetings during this session. I am not complaining. I care nothing about it. I only want to say this: That this committee was provided for in 1812. During all the time that the Republicans were in charge of this House, I think without exception, that committee was awarded a clerk at each session of the Congress, and the record shows that during all of that time, under a Republican administration, it met only a few times about the year 1876. Since the Democratic Party has been in control of the House that committee has done considerable work, covering many weeks' time, and have saved the Government enough money to pay the salary of a clerk for the next 50 years, if they wanted to give it to him.

Mr. GILLETT. Was not that work done at the time when the administration was of a different political character from the House?

Mr. HAMLIN. It was; and very valuable work was done. I am only curious to know, when the control of this House passes to the Republicans next session, what they will do as to the allowance of a clerk for this committee. I predict that you will do, as you always have done, give these committees clerks whether they do any work or not. These committees ought to be given clerks or the committees should be abolished.

Mr. HASTINGS. I move the previous question.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I really agreed not to; but I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I only want to ask a question.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then I yield first to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. I wanted to ask whether under the amendment offered by the committee provision is made for an additional clerk to the enrolling clerk of the House?

Mr. HASTINGS. That was attended to in the other resolution, which we have already passed.

Mr. GARD. That seems to be the one thing that is really necessary at this time.

Mr. SANFORD. That was covered in House resolution 460.

Mr. HASTINGS. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. HASTINGS. Such time as the gentleman desires.

Mr. MANN. I think the Committee on Enrolled Bills was allowed a clerk at $150 a month instead of $125 a month.

Mr. HASTINGS. At $6 a day.

Mr. MANN. I notice that the resolution reported by the committee strikes out the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department. Neither does it provide for the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings. I should think if any of these committees on expenditures were going to be busy, and properly busy at this time, it would be first the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, second the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, and possibly the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, though I do not know whether that committee would have jurisdiction of some of the frauds that have been committed. Certainly there is room for investigation, even from friendly sources.

I should be delighted to see the Democratic Party investigate some of the things in the War Department and in the public buildings which have been constructed, because even partisanship could not prevent the bringing in of severely critical reports. Mr. Speaker, I think it is safe to say that in the next Congress the committee which will investigate the War and Navy Departments and various other departments of the Government will properly be provided with help, because we know that in a great many places in the Government there have been rotten frauds, not to mention conscienceless actions and intellectual mistakes. It will not be so pleasant then. Why do you not commence the investigation now? Are you afraid of what you will find? Here are these committees, they want clerks, and the ones which are of least importance have the greatest demand for clerks. I hope they will go ahead. Certainly the committees of these other branches of the Government ought to be at work investigating. Throw the light of "pitiless publicity" on some of the things that have taken place.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution as amended by the substitute.

The resolution as amended by the substitute was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14078, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. Pending that motion I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, when the committee rose yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] had not concluded his remarks. Can the Speaker give me any information as to just how much time is remaining to the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if we can not make some agreement as to the limitation of time for general debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I am in a much more agreeable frame of mind this morning, in respect to agreement for time, than I was yesterday.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yesterday the gentleman was good enough to take my suggestion, and this morning I am perfectly willing to take any suggestion that the gentleman has to make.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understood from the RECORD that the gentleman has consumed probably 44 minutes more than this side of the House. I will ask the gentleman if he is willing to agree to 3 hours for general debate, 1 hour and 45 minutes to be controlled by myself and 1 hour and 15 minutes by himself?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is satisfactory.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 3 hours, 1 hour and 45 minutes to be controlled by myself and 1 hour and 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 3 hours, 1 hour and 45 minutes to be controlled by himself and 1 hour and 15 minutes by the gentleman from Wisconsin. Is there objection?

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to get about 15 minutes this morning in some way.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman comes in at the very last minute and asks for time after I have made my arrangements to provide these other gentlemen with time.

Mr. LITTLE. That is correct. I am asking for time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Let me say this to the gentleman from Kansas: I understand that either the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill or the Indian appropriation bill will be taken up immediately after this bill is concluded. We spent all day yesterday on general debate and are going to spend three hours to-day. If we can get through with this bill by to-morrow or by Friday, the gentleman will doubtless be able to arrange for some time on these other bills, and I hope that that will satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLE. But I want to speak on this bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman wants to speak on this bill, he will have opportunity under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LITTLE. I have no objection to this, providing I get about 10 minutes, though I would rather have 15.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask whether the time remaining to my colleague [Mr. DENISON] is to be taken out of this time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If this request which I have submitted is agreed to, I understand that it will be.

Mr. MANN. Of course, it would be under the request, but I understand it was not to be. It is already charged up against the gentleman from Wisconsin on the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He will have eight minutes. I am willing to make it an hour and 25 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LITTLE. That should give me some time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would be very glad to give the gentleman from Kansas some time, but not 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee modify his request?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Wisconsin desires additional time in order to take care of the gentleman from Illinois—

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be able to give the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. How much time could the gentleman give me?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will do the very best I can with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee modify his request?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Make it 1 hour and 25 minutes for the gentleman from Wisconsin and 1 hour and 45 minutes to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. The request is for 3 hours and 10 minutes of general debate, 1 hour and 45 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee and 1 hour and 25 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14078) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to yield time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]? Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] to continue his remarks interrupted last evening by darkness overcoming the Chamber.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I was temporarily out of the Chamber when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] was discussing the railroad problem, or rather his solution of it.

I desire to make a few observations on the railroad question, but I am not going to attempt at this time to enter into any detailed plan or solution of the problem, and I only want to make this observation: That whatever plan is proposed or adopted by Congress to settle the railroad problem, if it eliminates from the different individual railroad systems of the country the incentive for profit and competition and private initiative, we might just as well leave the railroads where they are to-day and let the Government own and operate them. And if the zone system which the gentleman proposed and discussed will have that effect upon the different railroad systems it will be useless as a solution of the railroad problem, and we might just as well admit it.

But I want to call the attention of the House first to a news item that was carried in the Washington papers last week, which I want to read:

RAILROAD LOSS $150,000,000—SUM REPRESENTS DEFICIT IN 1918 UNITED STATES WILL HAVE TO MAKE UP.

It will take six months more of receipts from the increased freight rates to permit the Government to recoup its losses, officials believe. If Congress does not approve the proposed five-year extension of Federal control and as a consequence President Wilson carries out his announced intention of returning the roads to private management at an early date, the Government's loss will not be made up.

BIG LOANS NOT INCLUDED.

This deficit does not include the big sums—between $150,000,000 and $200,000,000—which have been loaned to railroads to help them pay for the extensive program of improvements and purchase of new cars and locomotives. These loans will be repaid eventually.

Now, that news item went all over the country and was published in most of the country newspapers. I received several country newspapers from my district carrying this same item. In the Washington papers of January 11, particularly the Evening Star, I noticed a news item headed—

Walker D. Hines succeeds McAdoo as railroad chief.

And from that I read, as follows:

Walter D. Hines, Assistant Director General of Railroads, has been appointed Director General by President Wilson, succeeding William G. McAdoo, who now retires to private life.

RECOMMENDED BY MR. M'ADOO.

Mr. Hines, who was recommended by Mr. McAdoo, is an advocate of the latter's plan for five-year continuation of Government control to provide a test period and has supported most other policies of the retiring Director General, with whom he has been associated throughout the last year of Government management. He is accredited with having originated many policies of the Railroad Administration. If Congress does not enact new railroad legislation at an early date Mr. Hines favors returning the roads at once to private management, and this is expected to develop into a strongly contested issue within the next month or two.

Of course that, too, has gone all over the United States and was published in the country newspapers. Those two items will be pertinent to what I have to say on this question.

On August 29, 1916, an act of Congress became a law containing the following provision:

The President, in time of war, is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same, to the exclusion as far as may be necessary of all other traffic thereon, for the transfer or transportation of troops, war materials, and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needful or desirable.

This act was passed in view of the threatened trouble with Mexico, and afterwards, on January 1, 1918, the President, under the powers conferred upon him by this act, took possession of all the railroads of the country and began operating them under his war powers as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

On February 19 following, the bill known as the railroad-administration bill was called up for consideration in the House by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. This bill provided for fixing compensation to be paid to the owners of the railroads, the fixing of rates, the period of limitation, and the method of administration of the railroads while under Government control, and was very thoroughly and ably debated in the House. I thought then, and I think now, that no more important legislation had received the attention of Congress.

As the bill was originally prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury and submitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce it provided that the Government control of the railroads should continue indefinitely after the conclusion of peace, making further legislation by Congress necessary, at least under the theory of the bill, before the railroads could be returned to their original owners. Secretary McAdoo, then Director General of the Railroads, submitted a prepared statement to the House and Senate Committees on Interstate Commerce, which may be found on page 2347 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and in which he presented the reasons why he insisted that no time limit should be placed upon the control of the railroads by the Government, but that the period of Government control should by the law be made indefinite after the end of the war.

It will be remembered that the President took possession of the railroads of the country as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in the exercise of a war power under a law which conferred such power upon him only in time of war, and upon what theory, or under what provision of the Constitution, the Director of Railroads insisted that the Government control and operation of the railroads should continue indefinitely after the end of the war was never explained by Mr. McAdoo.

The views of the Secretary of the Treasury on indefinite Federal control were promptly disapproved by the Interstate Commerce Committees of both the House and the Senate, and when the bill was reported to the House it contained a provision limiting the period of Government control to 24 months after the declaration of peace. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], in presenting the bill to the House, said (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 2338:

The majority of our committee are of the opinion that a definite period of two years should be set as the time limit within which such legislation should be matured and enacted. Obviously the period may thereafter be extended, if such extension be found necessary in the public interest. The majority were of the opinion that the insertion of a definite time limit for Federal control puts the burden of presenting proper measures of constructive legislation where it belongs—upon the owners of the properties—and that it is inconsistent with the public interest to allow a war control admittedly assumed for emergency purposes only to extend indefinitely in time of peace.

While the bill was under consideration for amendment, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] offered an amendment, striking out the provision limiting the time of Federal control to two years and inserting a provision making the time of Federal control indefinite as the bill was originally prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury. Upon this amendment there were 40 Members who voted for and 143 who voted against it, showing clearly the overwhelming sentiment of the House against an indefinite or even a very long period of Government control after the termination of the war. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] offered an amendment changing the period of Government control from two years to one year after the close of the war. Upon this amendment there were 115 voted "aye" and 97 voted "no" in the Committee of the Whole; but afterwards when a separate vote upon the Esch amendment was taken in the House there were 164 for and 205 against it, showing that the sentiment of the House was about evenly divided between those who believed that the period of Government control after the war should be two years, as decided by the committee, and one year. The Senate bill fixed the time of Government control at 18 months after the declaration of peace. In conference the two Houses agreed upon 21 months as a compromise. The bill passed the House on the 28th of February and became a law on March 21, 1918. I was one of those who voted for the Esch amendment fixing the period of Government control at one year instead of two years after the close of the war. And upon its final passage I voted against the bill, because I was opposed to conferring upon the President or the Director General of the Railroads the power of fixing freight and passenger rates for all the railroads in the country, and I was opposed to allowing the President to continue his control of the railroads as Commander in Chief of the Army under a war power for a period of two years after the war had ended and peace had been restored.

Mr. Speaker, the history of this legislation shows that Secretary McAdoo was very insistent that the period of Federal control of the railroads should remain indefinite after the close of the war, and that no limitation of the time of Government control should be inserted in the bill so that the railroads would go back to private control automatically. I do not know how true it may be, but I have been told that the Secretary was deeply disappointed, even resentful, at the action of Congress in refusing to accept his views and in limiting the time of Government control to 21 months after the close of the war.

Since the Railroad Administration bill became a law, on March 21 last, Mr. McAdoo has had absolute control of all the railroads of the country except the short-line railroads, which he released from Government control before Congress had time to pass legislation preventing him from doing so. I do not intend to indulge in any criticism of Mr. McAdoo's administration of the railroads, or to raise any question as to his purpose or motive in doing anything that he has done with them. All I wish to say is that the effect of his policy and his various acts as the Director of Railroads in carrying out his policy has been to dissipate, as far as possible, the individual organizations of the railroad companies; to destroy, as far as possible, their individual identity; to divert customary business from one road to another; and, in short, to scramble the railroads together so completely that the task of unscrambling them is going to present difficulties that I am sure were not foreseen by many of us at the time this legislation was enacted.

I have been told by practicable railroad men that many things have been done which, from the standpoint of economical operation of the railroads, were wholly unnecessary, but which, from the standpoint of thoroughly scrambling the railroads, were, of course, highly effective.

But, Mr. Speaker, I arose more particularly to speak briefly of the latest developments in the railroad question. The armistice, which closed the fighting and presaged the ending of the present war, was signed on November 11, and on December 3 President Wilson appeared before a joint session of the House and Senate to advise the Congress on the state of the Union and to suggest such legislation as he thought necessary. A new Congress had been elected, preparations were being made for the peace conference to settle the international questions growing out of the war, and the people were even then beginning to look to Congress for reconstructive legislation. Everyone, I think, who has been interested in public affairs has looked upon the railroad question as one of the greatest problems that confront the country, and one that will require the earliest and most serious attention of the Congress. Most of the Members of the House, I believe, and most of the country, I am sure, expected the President to speak with some definiteness upon the railroad question, and present to the Congress some solution of it, and to suggest such legislation as would enable the Government to return the railroads to their owners within the time fixed by Congress, and at the same time conserve the welfare of the public and of the owners of the roads.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Having taken the roads over, some legislation will necessarily be required to turn them back. Now, how are we as Congressmen going to reconcile the increase in pay of the men and the increase in passenger and freight rates?

Mr. DENISON. How are we going to reconcile them?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes; how are we going to work them out? The 2,000,000 men working for the railroad companies are going to say, "Before these roads go back we want to be protected in our wage increase." Now, how are we going to get along on that?

Mr. DENISON. There is no danger in the world but what the railroad men will be protected in their wage increase. None of us need worry about that. They will protect themselves.

Mr. EMERSON. You can not have an increased wage without increased rates.

Mr. DENISON. I think that is true, and we have got to become reconciled to the increased rates.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Just what does the gentleman from Ohio mean by his statement that legislation will be necessary in order to turn the railroads back? Does he mean necessary in the public interest? It will certainly not be necessary as a matter of law.

Mr. EMERSON. That may be true, but I do not concede for a moment that the Government is going to take over these railroads and then turn them back on the stockholders without taking care of them in some way.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It may be in the public interest, but I was interested in the gentleman's statement that it would require some further legislation in order that the railroads might go back.

Mr. EMERSON. I think it will, will it not?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It will not.

Mr. DENISON. Legally it will not, but for practical reasons some legislation will be required.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It may be very desirable, but certainly we can turn the railroads back without any further legislation.

Mr. EMERSON. I do not think the Government will turn them back without further legislation.

Mr. DENISON. I think some general railroad legislation is very desirable.

I confess I was greatly surprised when the President began his discussion of the railroad problem with the following statement:

> The question which causes me the greatest concern is the question of the policy to be adopted toward the railroads. I frankly turn to you for counsel upon it. I have no confident judgment of my own. I do not see how any thoughtful man can have who knows anything of the complexity of the problem. It is a problem which must be studied—studied immediately and studied without bias or prejudice. Nothing can be gained by becoming partisans of any particular plan of settlement.

I venture to say that this statement struck the Congress as being most unusual for the President. During the past four years there have been many far-reaching and difficult problems presented to us for solution. I think I have heard every address that has been made to the Congress by the President during that time; addresses in which he presented to us for our consideration questions which involved not only the very safety and existence of our Government, but the peace and the prosperity and the welfare of our people at home. I do not recall that the President had ever before presented a problem to Congress without giving us at the same time his solution of it. He has not only recommended what we should do, but generally insisted that we should do it. When a great railroad strike was threatened just before the election of 1916 and the difficult question of properly adjusting an industrial dispute had to be met, if I remember correctly, the President came before us in joint session and presented to us a definite and, to him, a complete solution to the difficulty. It seems, too, that the President has, during these recent trying times, evolved a formula of 14 fundamental principles, which he has enunciated and which, at least in his own opinion, have been the goal for which our men have been fighting in France, and the acceptance of which will solve all the national and international difficulties that have occupied the attention of a distressed world for the past four and a half years, and which, it is claimed, will result in peace on earth and good will among men everywhere. In fact, the President, during his terms of office, has at one time or another had under consideration many great questions which involved our international relations and our industrial and economic welfare, and he has always had a solution that he could recommend to Congress. But how strange it was that the President, after having had control and operation of the railroads of the country for a year, and after having had the counsel and advice of the wise men of his Cabinet and of the Director of Railroads, should come before the Congress and frankly admit that he had no recommendation to make as to the disposition of the railroads.

And how strange, how passing strange, was the President's statement, that he frankly turned to Congress for counsel upon any question. I do not recall that he had ever, on any former occasion, turned to Congress for counsel. His statement that he frankly turned to the Congress for counsel upon this question was so inconsistent with the President's past attitude toward Congress that I confess I could accept it only with considerable mental reservation on my part. However, referring further to the railroad problem, the President said:

> Let me say at once that I have no answer ready. The only thing that is perfectly clear to me is that it is not fair either to the public or to the owners of the railroads to leave the question unanswered, and that it will presently become my duty to relinquish control of the roads even before the expiration of the statutory period, unless there should appear some clear prospect in the meantime of a legislative solution. Their release would at least produce one element of a solution, namely, certainty and a quick stimulation of private initiative.

And later he said:

> I hope that the Congress will have a complete and impartial study of the whole problem instituted at once and prosecuted as rapidly as possible. I stand ready and anxious to release the roads from the present control, and I must do so at a very early date if by waiting until the statutory limit of time is reached I shall be merely prolonging the period of doubt and uncertainty, which is hurtful to every interest concerned.

Gentlemen of the House, I have studied carefully that part of the President's message which deals with the railroad question. I have studied it in view of his attitude and of the attitude of Mr. McAdoo at the time of the enactment of the Railroad Administration law to which I have been referring. I have studied it in the light of the administration of the railroads by Mr. McAdoo during Government control. I have studied it in view of the subsequent statements of Mr. McAdoo, to which I will presently refer; and from my study of the message I think these conclusions are justified: That the President's statement that he had no solution of the railroad problem and no recommendation to make to Congress upon that question was, to say the least, very unusual and unnatural; that the President wished to impress upon the Congress the difficulties of the railroad problem by showing Congress that he, after having had control of the railroads for a year, and after having the counsel and assistance of some of the ablest railroad men of the country, could not make any suggestion as to the necessary legislation; that he expected the present Congress, during this short session when all the time is usually required to pass the necessary appropriation bills, to pass some legislation upon the railroad question before the 4th of March; that in order to secure this legislation by the 4th of March the President would hold over Congress the threat that, if such legislation was not enacted, it will be his duty to relinquish his control of the roads at an early date and return them to their original owners without waiting for the expiration of the 21 months. In other words, the President knew that Congress could not possibly pass permanent railroad legislation before the 4th of March, yet he faced us with the statement that if we did not pass some kind of legislation he would relinquish control of the railroads at an early date.

The question that naturally suggested itself to my mind was, What legislation did the President want that he was unwilling to recommend or even suggest? The answer to this question is found in the recent communication from Mr. McAdoo to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House and found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 12.

I hope that the Members have all read this statement of Mr. McAdoo's carefully. It purports to be a statement of his views as to the course that should now be pursued by Congress with reference to the railroads. It does him great credit as a capable, far-seeing politician. It is an ingenious argument of one who professes to be opposed to Government ownership of railroads in favor of a plan for the Government to operate the railroads for a period of five years at the expense of at least $2,500,000,000 for the purpose of experimenting and demonstrating to the country that Government operation is the best solution of the railroad problem. This letter of Secretary McAdoo is dated December 11, just eight days after President Wilson addressed Congress on the railroad question. It is inconceivable, to my mind, that the Director of Railroads would have presented this recommendation to Congress without having consulted the President; and it is just as inconceivable to me that President Wilson should have prepared his message to Congress upon the railroad question without having fully discussed and having come to an agreement and understanding upon the subject with his Secretary of Treasury and Director of Railroads.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Is it not a fact that Director General McAdoo said at the time he submitted this plan that he had the approval of the President?

Mr. DENISON. That is true. I am coming to that.

All doubt upon that question is removed by Mr. McAdoo himself, because he says, in the last paragraph of his statement, "the President has given me permission to say that this conclusion accords with his own view of the matter."

Now, let me call attention briefly to just two or three sentences in Secretary McAdoo's statement. To begin with, he says:

The war is ended, and we are now confronted with the necessity either of legislating intelligently about the railroad problem at this session of the Congress or of promptly returning the railroads to their owners.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENISON. For a brief question.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it the gentleman's idea that during that eight days' interim the President's mind was wholly neglectful of this subject?

Mr. DENISON. No; my impression is they had an understanding before the eight days.

Mr. BLANTON. He could have reached a conclusion in the eight days.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, he could have done so; but, of course, we know that is not natural; they must have had an understanding.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it the gentleman's idea that the President was not honest in his assertion to Congress?

Mr. DENISON. No; I never said or intimated that.

Mr. BLANTON. That is his insinuation.

Mr. DENISON. It is not so; I did not intend that. But possibly it might be inferred that the President was not as frank as we were led to believe

Mr. McAdoo ignores the fact that the railroads were taken over by the Government only for one purpose—as a war necessity; he ignores the fact that the railroads were not taken over for the purpose of legislating on the railroad problem, but in order to enable us to more effectively prosecute the war; he ignores the fact that Congress has 21 months after the declaration of peace to solve the railroad problem. Why should Mr. McAdoo think that this legislation has to be passed at the present session of this Congress? He knows that the President can call an extra session of Congress for the express purpose of considering this question during the coming summer, and he knows that before the 21 months expire Congress will have met and a regular long session will have passed. What the Secretary meant but did not say was that it was necessary, in his view, for this legislation to be passed by a Democratic instead of a Republican Congress.

Mr. McAdoo further says:

It will be impossible, I presume, to secure legislation in this short period providing a permanent solution of the railroad problem. This being true, only three courses are open: (1) Government operation of the railroads for one year and nine months following a proclamation of peace, which would mean, in my judgment, Government operation for a period in no event longer than two years and three months; (2) the prompt return of the railroads to private control; or (3) extension of the period of Federal control to five years.

He then proceeds to present an ingenious argument showing the total inadequacy of the present railroad administration law, showing the impossibility of continuing to operate the railroads under the present law, because, he says, it was not enacted in some respects in the form in which he originally wanted it to be enacted; showing the disastrous results to the public and the owners of the railroads that would follow their prompt return to private control; and concluding with a recommendation and a request for immediate legislation by this Congress extending the period of Government control to five years. And the reasons why he urges that the period of Government control be extended to five years are to enable the Government to expend at least $2,500,000,000 in improving the railroads and to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the people of the country the practicability of operating the railroads more economically under unified control.

Now, I ask the Members if it does not seem strange to you, as it did to me, that the President, in addressing Congress on December 3, should state that he had no confident judgment of his own upon the railroad problem and no recommendation to make as to what legislation should be enacted, and yet eight days later the Secretary of the Treasury and Director of Railroads should present to Congress a concise and positive recommendation and request for legislation extending the period of Government control five years, accompanied by the statement that this recommendation and request was made with the President's express approval.

Gentlemen of the House, I think Secretary McAdoo should be entirely frank with the Congress. I think he should give us credit for possessing at least some amount of intelligence. I think he and we should be frank with the people. I do not think we should do anything under false pretenses, and if anything has been done under false pretenses I think it is our duty to disavow it promptly and effectively.

I know that Congress authorized and approved the taking over of the railroads by the Government for one purpose only, and that was as a war measure, to enable us to more efficiently prosecute the war. There are, of course, some Members of Congress who openly and frankly believe in Government ownership of railroads. But I do not believe there are as many as a dozen Members of the House who would have authorized the President to take over the railroads, either for the purpose of owning or operating them permanently by the Government or for the purpose of experimenting in Government ownership or operation, in order to test out or demonstrate the theory of Government ownership.

The people of the country have been led to believe, and we are responsible for it, that the Government took over the railroads as a war necessity. I believed then, and I believe now, that Mr. McAdoo and others connected with the present administration had another purpose in view, and that purpose was to experiment with Government ownership, with a view to grafting that policy permanently upon our Government. But this ulterior purpose was so submerged under war necessity that Congress could not thwart it, although an effort was made to do so by placing a definite limitation upon the time of Government control.

And now comes the Director of Railroads with the bold and open recommendation that we throw off the mask of war necessity entirely, the war now having been ended, and that we extend the period of Government control five years in order to carry out this socialistic experiment in Government operation of railroads; in order to expend at least $2,500,000,000 of the people's money—and, in my judgment, it will be a great deal more than that—in making material improvements for the railroads.

Gentlemen of the House, I will not be a party to a program of this kind, which will amount to a plain deception of the people and the consummation of a questionable purpose which was begun under a patriotic pretense.

Mr. McAdoo does not state under what provision of the Constitution Congress has the power to continue the control and the operation of the railroads of the country for a period of five years when the country is not at war. The railroads were taken over by the President under the exercise of his war power. His rights under the exercise of that power must necessarily cease as soon as possible after the war has ended. There is but one other provision in the Constitution under which Congress could possibly take possession of the railroads according to law, namely, the commerce clause, under which Congress is given power to regulate commerce between the States. In the exercise of that power to regulate commerce between the States Congress could, I suppose, on behalf of the Government condemn and take over the interstate railroads and operate them. But in that case the value of the railroads would have to be ascertained and due compensation promptly paid to the owners. Congress has no power under the commerce clause of the Constitution to take over the railroads of the country for a period of five years for the purpose of demonstrating that they could operate better under a unified control or for the purpose of expending a few billion dollars of the people's money in the improvement of them. I venture the opinion that there can be found no authority under the Constitution for the legislation which Mr. McAdoo asks, and that if Congress should, after the war is ended and when no war necessity exists, pass legislation to continue the control and operation of the railroads for five years for the purposes mentioned by Mr. McAdoo, such legislation would be held to be invalid if it should be tested in the courts.

But aside from the lack of constitutional authority for such legislation, I think we should reject it because it would be morally wrong for the Government to continue in the possession of the property of the railroad companies for one purpose when we took possession of them for another.

In his letter to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee Mr. McAdoo further says:

There is one, and, to my mind, only one, practicable and wise alternative, and that is to extend the period of Federal control from the one year and nine months, provided by the present law, to five years, or until the 1st day of January, 1924. This extension would take the railroad question out of politics for a reasonable period. It would give composure to railroad officers and employees. It would admit of the preparation and carrying out of a comprehensive program of improvement of the railroads and their terminal facilities; would immensely increase the efficiency of transportation machines. It would put back of the railroads the credit of the United States during the five-year period, so that the financing of these improvements could be successfully carried out. It would offer the necessary opportunity, under proper conditions, to test the value of the unified control, and the experience thus gained would of itself indicate the permanent solution of the railroad problem.

This suggestion of Mr. McAdoo's that the extension of the period of Federal control to five years would take the railroad question out of politics for a reasonable period is one that ought to excite our interest. To me it is amusing and might well suggest the inquiry as to whether Mr. McAdoo is speaking with more or less mental reservation or whether he assumes that the Members of Congress have had no experience with politics and are incapable of any judgment of their own as to the effect of such legislative action upon a question which ought to be an industrial or economic question only.

A more recent statement of Mr. McAdoo, it seems to me, will throw a great deal of light upon this very question, and I think ought to be called to the attention of the House and of the country. This statement was made on Sunday, December 15, and the occasion was a union peace jubilee of the associated congregations of six churches held at the Sixty-ninth Regiment Armory in New York City. Mr. McAdoo was one of the speakers, and in the course of his address he made some remarks on the railroad question which I think are exceedingly significant and afford a key by which his real attitude toward the railroads and his recommendation for railroad legislation are made quite plain. According to the New York Sun of Monday, December 16, Mr. McAdoo said:

I don't know anything more inappropriate than the discussion of the Government ownership of railroads at a church meeting. The Government had to take over the transportation systems during the war, and the private owners had for the time being to step aside. Now, you can do what you please with them. It makes no difference to me whether you decide on Government ownership or not. The majority will rule in the matter, and I am not afraid of the decision of the majority. I think well of American people, even though they did return a Republican Congress last election.

According to the New York Tribune of the same date, Mr. McAdoo refused to forecast the future of the American railroads and said:

"I won't suggest whether I think we ought to have public or private ownership," he said. "We will leave that to the people, and I have faith in their intelligence to judge correctly, even if they did return a Republican Congress last election."

The New York Times of the same date made the following statement:

In his address Secretary McAdoo reviewed the historic points in the Nation's war policy, briefly indicating the unprecedented character of the selective-service act, the liberty loan campaigns, the war-insurance act, and digressed to say concerning the railroad problem that he did not care whether they remained under Government ownership or whether they were returned to private hands. However, he felt certain that whatever was done the decision of the majority of the American people would be decisive, and of the outcome of that decision he had no fears.

Thus Mr. McAdoo, as late as December 15, addressing the people of his own city and State, says that the question of Government or private ownership and control of the railroads is one to be settled not by the Congress but by the people. It is a question, according to the Secretary, upon which the majority will rule, and he is not afraid of a decision of the majority. "We will leave that to the people, and I have faith in their intelligence to judge correctly."

I ask you, gentlemen of the House, what does Mr. McAdoo mean when on December 11 he addresses the Commerce Committees of the Congress, telling them there must be legislation at this short session and that it will be impossible to provide permanent legislation, and that the only reasonable course we can take is to extend the time of Government control for a period of five years, and then addresses the people of New York one week later, telling them that the question as to whether or not we shall have Government or private ownership of railroads is a question which the people themselves must settle and which the majority must decide? How can the question of Government or private ownership of the railroads be made a question to be determined by the majority of the people unless it be made a political issue in a political campaign? If Mr. McAdoo meant anything at all in his New York address, he meant just what he said—in substance, that the question of wnether or not we should have Government or private ownership and operating of railroads in this country is a question which must be made the issue in a Nation-wide political campaign.

In his recommendation to the Congress on December 11 he says that by extending the period of Federal control five years the railroad question will be taken out of politics; and then one week later he tells the people of New York that the railroad question must be made a political question and be determined by a majority of the people. The two statements of the Secretary are directly contradictory and inconsistent. If we are to look to either to find his real views, in my judgment, we come nearer getting them in his address at the union peace jubilee meeting in New York than in his communication to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to indulge in any partisan criticism of Mr. McAdoo. But I am within my proper privilege, I think, when I compare his statements upon the railroad question and draw from them and from his management of the railroads while under his control such inferences as I think are reasonable. I believe that Mr. McAdoo believes in the permanent Government control of all railroads, and that he thinks that the continued control and operation of the railroads for a period of five years will not only demonstrate the wisdom of Government ownership but will make it necessary. When the railroad bill was under consideration last February and Mr. McAdoo insisted that the period of Government control should be indefinite after the end of the war I believe it was his intention then not only to use the railroads for the purpose of the war but for the further purpose, in his own language, of affording "the necessary opportunity, under proper conditions, to test the value of unified control."

He knows that permanent railroad legislation can not possibly be enacted at the present short session of this Congress. He knows that such legislation will be enacted by the Republican Congress which is to follow this one, and that such legislation will be passed before the next national campaign, and that the railroad question will thereby be really kept out of politics. But Mr. McAdoo wants the present Democratic Congress to extend the period of Government control five years, so that the railroads may be used as an experiment in Government ownership, and in the meantime at the next presidential campaign the question of Government ownership of railroads will be made a political question to be determined, as he says in his New York speech, by a majority of the people.

We may as well be frank with ourselves and candid with our constituents and speak plainly about this question. Mr. McAdoo does not want the railroad question settled before the next national election. He wants it settled at the next national election. What else could his New York speech mean?

Since Mr. McAdoo delivered his New York speech he has been before the Commerce Committee of the Senate and has made a statement not only urging that Congress pass legislation extending the period of Government control five years, but he has stated, in answer to direct questions from members of the committee, that if this Congress does not grant his request and extend the time of Government control he has no other plan or legislation that he cares to suggest or recommend. This attitude of Mr. McAdoo throws additional light upon his real purpose. If he has any constructive plan of railroad legislation to recommend to the Congress, he is unwilling to recommend it at this time. He is determined to have just one thing, namely, a five-year extension of Government control.

In my judgment there are two courses which Congress can take with reference to the railroad problem, either of which will make it a political issue in the presidential campaign to be determined by the people along political instead of economic lines. In the first place, if this Congress passes the legislation Mr. McAdoo wants passed and extends the Federal control of the railroads for five years, the question of Government ownership will be the dominant political issue in the next national campaign, and in that case the Democratic Party will be responsible.

In the second place, if the Republican Congress that will come into power on the 4th of next March does not take up the railroad question and settle it promptly by the enactment of wise permanent railroad legislation, then, in that case, it will be a political issue in the next campaign; and the Republican Party will be responsible.

Many of us still remember Mr. Bryan's Madison Square Garden speech delivered a number of years ago in which he advocated Government ownership and operation of all the railroads. The socialist element of the Democratic Party has for years been in favor of it. Men high in the councils of that party today, such as Senator LEWIS, from my own State, Secretary Burleson, Secretary Lane, Secretary Wilson, Secretary Baker, and others, as I am informed, are favorable to it. If the railroad question is not permanently settled, so far as it can be by legislation, before the next national campaign, the Democratic national platform in 1920 will contain a straight-out declaration for Government ownership and operation of the railroads, cables, telegraphs, and telephones. That part of the Democratic Party that can be controlled by Mr. McAdoo, Mr. Burleson, and President Wilson and Davie Lewis quite apparently want the permanent settlement of the railroad question postponed in order to experiment with it and make of it a political plaything and in order to capitalize it in the next national campaign, just as they tried to capitalize the Adamson law in the last presidential campaign.

There is a propaganda going on now all over this country in favor of Government ownership of the railroads. It emanates from Washington City and reaches to every part of the country. Press dispatches, inspired by Mr. McAdoo or by others here in Washington who want Government ownership of railroads, are sent out to all parts of the country advocating Mr. McAdoo's proposition of extending the time of Government control for five years.

As an illustration let me cite one case of what is being done. Last summer a large delegation of business men of the Mississippi Valley, who believed that water transportation on the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers should be encouraged by the Government in order to help relieve the railroad situation, came to Washington to have a hearing before Mr. McAdoo, with a view to getting the Government to construct a line of barges for the transportation of bulky freight on the rivers. Mr. McAdoo referred the matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission, who gave an extended hearing. Several of the Senators and many Members of the House were present at the hearing, where the question was fully presented. Afterwards, upon the recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Mr. McAdoo decided to construct barges for the Mississippi River, and work upon them was begun. Early in December, after the armistice was signed, it was reported in the press dispatches that the Government would abandon the policy it had begun with reference to the construction and operation of barges on the Mississippi River. Immediately the business men of Cairo, Ill., sent a telegram to Mr. McAdoo to inquire whether or not the Railroad Administration intended to abandon the work it had undertaken for the encouragement of river traffic. Mr. McAdoo wired back in reply to the effect that if we are to have river transportation fostered by the Government until it is an assured success we must also accept his plan of having the railroads remain under Government control for the next five years. Let me quote from Mr. McAdoo's telegram as it was published in the Cairo Evening Citizen on December 16 last:

It is proper that I should call your attention to the fact, however, that unless Congress shall extend the period of Federal control so that a reasonable opportunity may be afforded for a fair test of the value of unified railroad operation along with coordinated inland waterway operation, the experiment on the Mississippi River may not hold out much promise. I doubt if the Mississippi River operation can produce satisfactory results if the railroads should be turned back soon to private control. The old methods of railroad competition with waterways transportation will be revived, and it is probable that the waterways experiment may not be able to survive that competition. I suggest these phases of the problem because interest in proper waterways development has been manifested frequently. I think your business men's organizations in Cairo should consider very seriously the importance of extending the period of Federal control in order that a fair test of unified operation of the railroads may be made and that along with it the inland waterways may be developed and a fair opportunity given to demonstrate the usefulness of such development.

Of course, Mr. McAdoo knows that the business interests of the Mississippi Valley are deeply interested in the revival and the development of river traffic, and he apparently hopes by this kind of propaganda to enlist the assistance of those interests in influencing the Members of Congress from the Mississippi Valley to support his proposed plan of extending the period of Government control.

And I have seen press dispatches recently indicating that there is a general campaign going on all over the country, the apparent purpose of which is to induce various organizations and interests to communicate with the Members of Congress and urge support for Mr. McAdoo's proposed plan of extending the time of Government control.

I, of course, do not know what action the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House or the Commerce Committee of the Senate will take at this session on the plans submitted by Mr. McAdoo. He insists that he is urging his plan in order to keep the railroads out of politics. I think the country understands that he is doing so in order to bring the railroads into politics. Mr. McAdoo may be able, by the approval and the support of the President, to coerce this Congress into extending the time of Government control for five years by the threat to return the railroads to their private owners at an early date. But if they do so, the people of the country will, in my judgment, hold them and their party to a strict accounting for it.

I think the Republicans in Congress should insist upon an extra session being called by the President so that permanent railroad legislation may be enacted as early as possible. We have had very arduous duties to perform here during the last four years, and I know that it will be an added burden for the Congress to have to meet in extra session during the coming spring. But the Republican Party ought not to shirk its plain duty. It ought to assume the responsibility of settling this question during the coming year. It is an industrial or economic and not a political question and ought not to be made a political question by postponing it over the next presidential campaign.

Any person who makes a political prophecy takes more or less chance in doing so, for a certain odium results if he turns out to be a bad prophet. But I am willing to predict that if this Congress extends the time of Government control of railroads five years after peace is declared, the Director of Railroads will, under the directions of the administration, proceed with Mr. McAdoo's policy of expending from two and a half to four billion dollars from the Public Treasury in the improvement of the railroads. He will continue the scrambling of the railroads until the identity of the different systems shall have been completely destroyed.

Government ownership of the railroads will be the dominant political issue in the next national campaign, and Mr. McAdoo will, of course, expect to be the candidate of his party for President. He will hope, of course, to capitalize what has been done for the railroad men. The increase of wages, to which the railroad men were, generally speaking, entitled even before the war, but which were made immediately necessary because of war conditions, will be claimed as an asset of the Democratic Party, and particularly of Mr. McAdoo. There are some who are so shortsighted as to believe that the railroad men of this country can be herded together and voted for this party or that party, or for this candidate or that candidate, because they have been given a substantial increase in their wages. Those who are so foolish as to believe this, those who think that the support of the railroad men of the country can be purchased by giving them out of the Public Treasury an increase of wages to which they were entitled as a matter of right, know very little about human nature and about the nature of railroad men in particular. The men who work upon the railroads of this country know what they are entitled to. They are patriotic, intelligent, and understand that conditions and the necessities growing out of them, rather than the gracious favor of any individual or set of individuals, have brought about their increase in wages. They have their politics just the same as you and I have, and they have the intelligence and courage to vote their own political convictions; and the man or set of men who think that the railroad laborers of this country will be voted at the next election for any man or any political party is going to be fooled.

I have seen in the public press recently where the representatives of the four brotherhoods had refused to approve a policy of Government ownership of railroads. I do not know whether this is true or not, but if it is true it was, in my judgment, a wise decision. If the railroad men of this country are looking to their own future interests and welfare they will hesitate to allow themselves to be influenced into the support of any policy that will take from them the right by which they have won what they now have. Let them inquire of the employees of the Post Office Department of our Government and they will get some valuable information on Government control.

I am opposed to Government ownership of railroads because I believe that private initiative and competition and the desire for profit will give better railroad service than will any system of Government ownership. I am opposed to it because I believe that under Government ownership the railroads will become a political rather than an industrial or economic organization. I am opposed to it because I do not believe the people of this country should have placed upon them at this time the tremendous burden of buying and operating the railroads of the country. I am opposed to it because I think the operation of the railroads by the Government will be detrimental to the interests of all the railroad workmen of the country, as well as to the public, who has to depend upon the railroads for service.

I think there should be a permanent secretary of transportation. He need not necessarily be a member of the Cabinet, but could occupy a place similar to that of Comptroller of the Currency. He should have supervision over the interstate railroads of the country similar to the supervision of the Government over national banks. I think all interstate railroads should be compelled to incorporate under the Federal Government, and the issue of stocks and bonds should be under strict Federal control. New construction, extensive improvements, and the issue of stocks or securities should be permitted only after a certificate of convenience and necessity has been granted by the secretary of transportation. Unification of terminals and reduction of expenses should, and naturally would, follow from this greater Federal control. Rates should be initiated by the railroad companies themselves, subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. A commission should be created to investigate and arbitrate by agreement questions of wages where such questions can not be settled by collective bargains. But private initiative, well-regulated competition, and the opportunity for reasonable reward, both to the owners of the railroads and their managers, for intelligent, efficient, and economical management of the railroads as business organizations and public agencies should never be destroyed; and railroad employees should never become employees of the Government.

I do not think it would be necessary or wise to enact legislation extending the time of Government control. The country wants better railroad service and wants the question settled soon. Congress can solve the question, and if the Republicans here are wise they will not delay it, but will enact permanent railroad legislation as soon after the 4th of March as possible. In any event, it should be done before this great industrial question is made a political football in a national campaign, even if it is necessary to have an extra session of Congress in order to accomplish it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for agreeing to indulge me this morning, and I want to say frankly while I have very positive opinions about it, what I am going to say has nothing to do with the railroad proposition per se. Incidentally, I do make some observations that perhaps a shrewd listener might construe as a sort of indirect expression of opinion upon some phases of that question. However, my speech is to be mainly reminiscent.

With the close of the present Congress I will leave the House after 22 years of unbroken service. It has not been as distinguished as every Member secretly hopes to make his service when it begins, but it has been conscientious, and I have done my utmost at all times to advance the highest interest, political and material, of all my countrymen. I have even tried to understand and consider the affairs of my fellow men in other countries, for we are now forced by circumstances to realize that the world is in a certain way growing smaller, and all recent and current history suggests the necessity for a cultivated "international mind."

I have long had great comfort in our isolation, and I can not help regretting that the affairs of Europe and Asia have become our affairs, and if our "associates," so called, in the great war should adopt the unfriendly suggestion to unload African colonies on us our cup of bitterness will overflow. Let us pray for deliverance from all these entangling foreign alliances just as far as possible, but if impossible, if such offenses must come, I believe we should prepare ourselves in every way to meet them bravely and intelligently.

Curiously enough my effort to understand the affairs of other countries has been sharply criticized by some small-minded people who seem incapable of comprehending a world larger than a congressional district and do not appear to know that the right to live in peace and prosperity is almost as important as an appropriation for a Federal building. [Applause.]

But in spite of the inevitable bitternesses and disappointments, petty jealousies, and misrepresentations I have found pleasure in the work of a Representative. In spite of unwarranted and stupid flings at the personal honor of Congressmen, as common as they are silly, I have been proud of the office of Representative, for I was brought up to reverence that branch of our Government that the makers of the Constitution saw fit to put in section 1 of Article I of that wonderful if unfashionable document.

Just to refresh your memories let me quote the first four lines of the Constitution of the United States:

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives.

The founders intended that this particular body should have primacy in the affairs of government, but in some respects it has fallen from its proud estate. Its great prototype, the British Commons, has grown steadily in importance and power since, under Edward the First, in the thirteenth century, the masses of England, by their representatives, were admitted to Parliament. To every patriotic American who believes in a government of the people through their representatives—the only practicable way, despite the clamor for referendum and recall and such like political nostrums—this decline in influence of the people's branch of the legislature causes grief and humiliation.

I heard a story recently that illustrates this decadence of the House. My informant said that the chairman of one of our great committees asked the chief of a department, whom he had the power to call before him, if we were to have any legislation touching that department during this session.

I try to believe that it was merely an unfortunate way of asking if the department referred to would recommend legislation before March 4.

What is the cause of this degradation of the first born of the Constitution? In thinking it over I have not been able to avoid the conclusion that it is due to a voluntary surrender of constitutional rights and duties that only need to be asserted to be respected. [Applause.] We surrender without a struggle rights that some of our British ancestors died for.

I have also reached the conclusion that unreasoning partisanship has something to do with this growth of a menace to the rights and liberties of the people through breaking down their representatives. I am a partisan, Mr. Chairman, and a strong believer in parties. They are necessary in free government, but they are not in themselves the purposes of our political organizations. Parties are supposed to stand for principles and their chief function is to see that those principles are applied to government. If that is not the purpose of their existence, they ought to perish. When devotion to mere party organization becomes so strong that principles are forgotten and loyalty to the instrument of their application is regarded as the thing of supreme importance, we have reached the danger line. That view has grown alarmingly in this body. I have heard Members jestingly say that they had raped the Constitution so often that one more outrage, if in the party interest, was of small importance.

To jest about the Constitution and the solemn oath we all take to support and defend it is as offensive to the moral sense as making jokes about a disregard of truth and personal honesty. But these things help one to understand the contempt with which legislative bodies are treated in the press and by the public they serve.

Yet, in spite of this yielding attitude, I hope and I believe that the American Congress, which is a great body, representing a mighty people, will assert itself and will regain its ancient standing and prestige.

THE FIFTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

My service here began in the Fifty-fifth Congress and was mainly one of observation and attention. I found it interesting and instructive. There were some great men here at that time in both parties. There were not as many self-styled "Reformers" and "Progressives" as developed later. Those who were here were the flotsam of an earlier political wreck, yet they exercised, and still exercise, a strange and baleful influence on legislation. In my humble judgment they were not superior in virtue, and certainly not in intellect, to the frankly robust partisans in both parties. I do not mean there are not some great men here now, but I was perhaps more impressionable at that period of my career. Not all who cry "Lord! Lord!" shall enter the Kingdom of Heaven, and I doubt if the world will ever accept at their own estimate these holier than thou people who have set themselves the task of criticizing other men's morals and regulating other men's habits. Sometimes when I grow weary of their antics I refresh myself by reading about the Pharisee who stood and prayed thus, "God, I thank Thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as the publican," and note with some satisfaction that the verdict of the Master was for the publican, who also stood and prayed.

There was in the Fifty-fifth Congress as leader of his party one of the greatest men I ever met. His information was so broad and his intellect so keen that he could snatch the heart out of any question presented for his consideration and by a flash of his incomparable wit make clear the murkiest situation.

I have always regretted that Mr. Reed could not have lived to expose with his biting, penetrating wit a lot of the cant and humbuggery of a later day.

In that Congress Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, was the Democratic leader, and a great one. There may have been men serving with him who were his peers; there may even have been wiser men among his colleagues; but I do not recall their names, and I am sure they could have been numbered on the fingers of one hand.

While the Cuban question was a hot issue in the early spring of 1898, there was a great deal of speech making, mostly sound and fury, and one day there was a debate in which Mr. Bailey had a leading part. The particular debate to which I refer turned on a resolution offered by him to recognize the Cuban Republic. A point of order was made that it was not a matter of privilege, and the Chair so held. The Democrats thought the decision wrong and contrary to the rules. Mr. Bailey was vehement and eloquent in his denunciation of the decision and provoked the anger of the Speaker. The Chair made an extremely clever speech, declaring, in substance, that being a mere man he was liable to error, but that the House, in its combined wisdom, was sure to be right, and then an appeal from his decision was submitted. Of course, the perfect machine that the Republican Party of that day was sustained him.

A few minutes later I had occasion to speak to him, and went to his desk for that purpose. At the same moment a southern Member, one of those parliamentary sharps who go about with a book in hand to entrap unsuspecting and better men, also approached the Speaker. He said: "Mr. Speaker, touching your decision of this morning, concerning the wisdom of which I no longer protest, as the House has sustained you, I would like to read you a few lines from this book." "Very well," the Speaker replied; "proceed." He then read a paragraph that contradicted the position taken by Mr. Reed in his ruling. The Speaker asked him from what book he was reading. "That," the Member said, as he smiled triumphantly, "is Thomas B. Reed on Parliamentary Law." "Oh, yes," said the Speaker; "I remember. But the book is wrong." [Laughter.]

There was another leading Republican in that Congress who interested me very much, and still does. I refer to Hon. JOSEPH GURNEY CANNON [applause], North Carolinian by birth, but a citizen of Illinois by habit and for official purposes [laughter], a much misrepresented and maligned individual and as good a legislator and as honest a man, in my opinion, as ever sat in this House. [Applause.] I have never thought that the cruel fight subsequently made on him was a creditable episode in American politics.

The Republican Party under the leadership of Reed, Dingley, CANNON, Dalzell, and Henderson was a wonderful machine, always lubricated and usually working overtime and remorselessly. It was cruel but efficient, and its victims admired it while they squirmed.

It was in that Congress that I made the acquaintance of some half a dozen great Missourians. No delegation ever had three brighter blades in the intellectual play of debate than Cowherd, De Armond, and CHAMP CLARK. [Applause.] The first two are dead, and by their deaths the State and the Union were made poorer.

Three more radically different men holding the same general political views and members of the same party it would be hard to find.

Cowherd had common sense to the point of genius. Frank, earnest, painstaking, he went to the bottom of all questions that interested him and before he finished his investigation he knew all that was knowable about them. He was a man of whom it might be said of every work to which he set his hand, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

De Armond had inherited from some remote French ancestor, who may have been the victim of religious persecution, an earnestness that made him appear almost fanatical. A student of men, history, and law, his subdued unemotional voice was heard all over the House, for it compelled the respectful attention of friend and foe alike. He was a master of debate. His tongue was a rapier and its owner shrunk from no encounter. His speeches went into the RECORD as uttered and are models of concise phrasing.

CHAMP CLARK, thank Heaven, is still with us [applause], elevated to a position which I dare say he picked out for himself in the Fifty-third Congress. Some of us hope he has been preserved for an even higher place than the Speakership. [Applause.] It is useless to tell you what manner of man he is, for he is in the understanding and the heart of nearly everybody here. He would blush if I were to say more.

In order to establish the truth of history I am going to tell of an incident during the discussions that preceded the declaration of war against Spain in 1898 in which he appeared. One day he made a vigorous speech, sparring, like all the other House orators, for political position, and just as he was closing he was asked a question by that excellent and amiable gentleman, George W. Steele, of Indiana.

The question was answered by Mr. CLARK, but when the RECORD appeared neither the question nor the answer was in it. Mr. Steele wanted to know why it had been left out. The RECORD, as posterity will have it, says Mr. CLARK said in reply that the question had nothing to do with what he was discussing and that he assumed responsibility for its failure to appear, that he kept it out because it marred the unity of his speech; besides, he had previously given advance copies of his speech to the newspaper men. [Laughter.] That is what he is reported to have said. Now for the facts. It is a case like that of the old guard at Waterloo, who said a picturesque thing, but in words that do not make choice family reading and others had to be substituted. The future Speaker told Mr. Steele that he had left the question out because it and the reply spoilt a damn good speech. The Indianian laughed good-naturedly and was satisfied.

In the course of my service I have seen the end of an epoch in the passing of the Confederate brigadiers, whose coming to Congress in the seventies caused so much unjustified alarm in the North.

What man is there, North or South, who can forget or regret the service in Congress of John T. Morgan and Edmund W. Pettis? [Applause.] Joe Wheeler, of Alabama, was in the House when I came, but soon after went into the Spanish War, and at the time of his death his faded Confederate gray uniform had become blue. McEnery, of Louisiana; the knightly Walthall, of Mississippi; Cockrell, of Missouri; and that wonderful Tennesseean, Isham G. Harris, with his sturdy old colleague, Bate, as honest as the blue of the sky and as brave as Cæsar, were all in Congress and all had been general officers in the Confederacy. Bate had shed blood for the Union in the War with Mexico and carried its scars with him to the grave.

I sat in the "Cherokee strip," now abolished, by the side of a Republican Member, Gen. James A. Walker, of Virginia, whose proudest boast was that he had commanded the Stonewall Brigade. Later came Gordon, of Tennessee, who was a Confederate brigadier at 25 and a gentleman to his death, more than 40 years later.

Of those with high military rank who served on the other side, so far as I am informed, there is only one left. He is a man whose mental and moral courage measures up to the rare physical quality that sustained him in 43 battles of the Civil War. It is a pleasure and privilege to know ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, of Ohio. I hope he will live to be a hundred years old and die a Member of Congress, if that is his ambition.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, the most bitter Republican partisan in Congress can not now regret that those men were sent here. They were loyal and their service in Congress was an outward and visible sign of a reunited country. Some of them added other honors to their age by drawing swords for the Union in 1898, and would have done so 20 years later if it had been physically possible. Instead they sent their sons to fight and die in France and Flanders.

I wonder if our friends in England and France have ever fully appreciated the real significance of the military association of 1917. "Saxon, Norman, and Dane are we," and I believe that it was something more than a transient political tie that brought those armies together, something far deeper. The sympathy and comprehension by which they made their fight so successful had its genesis with the people from whom they sprang, with the Huguenots of France, with the contemporaries of Bacon, Drake, and Shakespeare, all of whom wrought for freedom.

It was the descendants of these liberty lovers who fought for their faith, who broke the Spanish Armada and pulled the beard of Philip, that sent the Confederate brigadiers to Congress. If they committed a sin then, was it not expiated when their sons won the praise of Foch and Haig at Chateau-Thierry and in the Argonne? [Applause.]

TEXAS.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard a perfectly authentic story about a learned bishop who throughout a long and useful life was noted for his highly developed sense of humor. When he was on his deathbed a solicitous young clergyman asked him if he felt that he was passing away. "How do I know," the bishop replied, "I have never passed away before." This is my first swan song, and I am as ignorant of the rules for such an occasion as the bishop was of the mysteries of death. I can only hope the Chairman will be considerate and let his gavel alone until I can pay a little debt I owe to Texas before I cease to speak for her on this floor.

Of course, I believe Texas is not only the largest State in the federation but altogether the finest. I know it has the most picturesque and interesting history, even if it has no Plymouth Rock or Jamestown, and I have been amazed at the ignorance of that history of some otherwise well-informed gentlemen in Congress. It is my purpose to use a few minutes in telling just enough of the story of the great Commonwealth to encourage my friends who have asked about it to further investigation, and to answer questions that have often been asked me.

Texas has been under five flags. The Speaker, when pleading eloquently in the House for the St. Louis exposition of 1904, contended that it was at one time a part of Louisiana, and thus under the flag of France. But, omitting that claim as apocryphal, it still has vivid chapters of history under the sovereignty of Spain, Mexico, the Republic of Texas, the United States, and the Southern Confederacy. Yoakum's history says, and I suppose it is true, that the first European immigrants arrived in Texas in February, 1685, under the leadership of Robert Cavalier, Sieur de la Salle, but there are other historians who maintain that the Spanish missionaries who visited Santa Fe had been in Texas. However, that controversy is over a detail that does not concern me now.

La Salle did go to Texas in 1685 and did, after the manner of his time, take possession of the country in the name of Louis XIV, and tried to establish a colony. Hostile Indians and quarrels among his followers led to an abandonment of the colonization project. La Salle himself was murdered by one of his own men and was buried near the Neches, or some other Texas stream, but which will probably never be known.

In 1689 the Spanish Viceroy in Mexico took formal possession of the country in the name of his King, and thereafter Spain's title was never seriously challenged until 1810 when the Mexicans, led by a priest, Don Miguel Hidalgo, revolted and declared for an independent government. That revolution was soon ended by the capture and execution of the priest, but others followed, and after 11 turbulent years the sovereignty of Spain was extinguished.

In 1821 a grant of land was made to Moses Austin, who was born in Connecticut, had lived in Virginia, and was then a citizen of Missouri, and he was authorized to introduce 300 families from the United States. He died within a few months after making his contract with Mexico, but requested his great son, Stephen F. Austin, whose inadequate effigy stands in the old hall of representatives, to execute it. Austin took the first Anglo-American immigrants to Texas in 1822, 137 years after the failure of La Salle.

The venture proved to be an apple of discord thrown into a political and social situation that was normally in a state of suppressed or open revolt.

The impossible had been undertaken. Americans, by the terms of the contract, were putting themselves under the political dominance of an inferior people. In the earth strata are imposed one upon the other, and so it usually is in political organizations. When hardy, self-reliant Americans went to live among Mexican Indians it was quickly evident that they could not long remain the substratum, contract or no contract. The Americans were all trained to the hardships of the frontier and skilled in the use of arms, and the Mexicans had been guilty of great imprudence when they invited such men to come and live among them.

The Texas of that day was, as it is now, a land of strong temptation to the always land-greedy Anglo-Saxon. Its prairies, as far as the eye could see, were a carpet of flowers in spring and its soil as rich as soil can be. Game was so abundant that men could live with the minimum of work and follow the life of adventure most congenial to the descendants of those other men who after settling the first colonies had crossed the Appalachians to open up the great West. They were dangerous neighbors to a more indolent and less aggressive race.

In 1824 Mexico adopted a new constitution that was in some respects modeled on that of this country. But there were fatal dissimilarities. For example, there was no provision for trial by jury, there was a State religion, not that of the immigrants, and Congress was to interpret the constitution.

By that constitution Texas was associated with the exclusively Mexican State of Coahuila, and known as Coahuila and Texas. More ill-matched twins were never born. The Texans did not like the constitution and had most reluctantly consented to it, but made a reasonable effort to adjust themselves to it, and violation of the few rights guaranteed to them was the technical cause of the open revolt in 1835.

From about 1830 the American settlers had grown more and more restless. The eccentric and offensive application of an unfamiliar code, disturbing incidents now and then, such things as would have been settled by a minor court in our country, sometimes an open breach of the peace when the Mexican authorities were resisted with arms got on the nerves of the immigrants, and the Mexicans failed to remember that when Americans get nervous they have a fatal trigger habit.

Petty tyrannies continued, as did contempt for the contractual rights of the colonists under which they had been induced to settle in the wilderness. Then the absolute incompatability of the Anglo-Saxon and the Spanish-Mexican-Indian natures made a conflict unavoidable in spite of the earnest, honest efforts of Austin to prevent it. There were certain dominant, aggressive Americans in the colony who frankly wanted a break with Mexico and hardly made an effort to conceal their purpose to set up an independent government or associate Texas with the United States.

Santa Anna, the Mexican dictator, unwittingly promoted their designs. He was energetic and vicious, ambitious in a military way, and constantly referred to himself as the Napoleon of the West. He disliked and feared the Texans and wanted to expel them from Texas or destroy them.

In 1835 he forcibly dispersed the legislature of Coahuila and Texas, then sitting at Saltillo. The Texas members of that body avoided arrest and returned to their homes and quickly blew into a blaze the smoldering fires of revolution. Santa Anna's order for their arrest was disregarded but it brought matters to a head at once.

A meeting of the citizens of the municipality of Columbia on the 23d of June, 1835, issued an address to the inhabitants of the other municipalities calling for an assembly of all for the 15th of the following October. The meeting then proposed is known in history as the "General Consultation." A significant feature of the call is that the delegates were urged to ascertain and bring with them to the October meeting the number of inhabitants of their respective jurisdictions. They were already making a military inventory of man power.

The General Consultation met on the appointed day and in that meeting the Republic of Texas was really born. Two days later, the 17th of October, a letter was received from Gen. Austin, who was on his way to San Antonio with a small army to attack the Mexicans, in which he urged the delegates to adjourn their meeting and join him in the assault on San Antonio. A large number, preferring a fight to their civil duties, accepted the invitation and a few days later there was a battle between the Texans under Austin and the Mexicans at one of the missions just outside the present city of San Antonio. I need not tell you the Texans were brilliantly successful for that was their habit in such engagements.

On the 1st of November the General Consultation reconvened and published to the world a declaration of purposes and principles that was a sort of preliminary declaration of independence to be followed by a more formal one March 2, 1836.

This General Consultation continued as the government of Texas until October 22, 1836, when the Republic was organized under the presidency of Gen. Sam Houston. Gentlemen who want to understand these movements and want to know something about the capacity of these frontiersmen for the administration of government would do well to read the declaration of purposes and principles issued in November, 1835, and the declaration of independence of March 2, 1836.

It may interest you to know who the 58 signers of the declaration of independence were. Eleven were from Virginia, 9 from North Carolina, the same number from Tennessee, while Kentucky furnished 5 and Georgia and South Carolina 4 each. New York and Pennsylvania were each represented by the signatures of 2 native sons. Massachusetts, never a laggard in such enterprises, had 1 representative, as did New Jersey.

England, Ireland, Scotland, and Canada each had the name of one man on the roll of honor, as did Mexico in the person of De Zavala.

Among the interesting names found on that document are those of Sam Houston, Thomas J. Rusk, afterwards Secretary of War for the Republic and Senator in the United States Congress, and Samuel Augustus Maverick, about all of whom too little is known in other States. The names of other great figures in the Texas war of independence are better known in doubtful tradition and romance than in the dignified pages of history, where they belong. There was, for instance, Col. James Bowie, a brave and honorable member of a distinguished Maryland family of that name, who is chiefly known to his countrymen as the inventor of a knife. Then there was David Crockett, at one time a Member of this House from the Tennessee section, so ably represented by Mr. GARRETT, who is remembered mainly as the hero of hunting adventures and doubtful stories. He and Bowie fought the good fight together and died in the defense of liberty in the absolutely unparalleled massacre of the Alamo.

Another and even more interesting case of perverted history is that of Samuel A. Maverick, a relative of Samuel Maverick, the Massachusetts lad whose monument stands on Boston Common, with those of other bold patriots, who shed the first blood in the contest with King George's men in 1770.

Mr. Maverick was born in Charlestown, S. C., of well-to-do and distinguished parents, and educated at Yale College. Like many another bold and adventure-loving young man, he went to Texas in 1835 to seek his fortune. He arrived just in time to join in the revolution and to participate under Ben Milam in the assault on and capture of San Antonio. He was one of the signers of the declaration of independence, and under the Republic represented the district of Bexar in the first congress.

In 1842 he and other citizens of San Antonio were captured by the Mexican general, Woll, and marched about 1,200 miles through an almost waterless, treeless, and foodless desert to southern Mexico, where he was imprisoned in the Castle of Perote. For months he wore a ball and chain, still proudly exhibited by his sons, and worked in the quarries.

Through the intercession of Waddy Thompson, then minister from the United States to Santa Anna's turbulent autocracy, he was permitted to return to San Antonio in time to become a member of the last congress of the Republic, that which arranged by treaty for the admission of Texas into the American Union.

And yet this brave and honorable man who spent his entire adult life in constructive work for his country has been the victim of a false and libelous story, told usually without malice, but with that preference for what is picturesque rather than that which is true, that has done such grave injustice to many of our nation-building frontiersmen. Every western man knows that the word "maverick" is used to describe unbranded cattle, but few know the origin of its use. The Century Dictionary, in defining the word, quotes as authority an absolutely correct definition made by the late Col. Roosevelt in the Century Magazine. Col. Roosevelt says "unbranded cattle are called 'mavericks,' and when found on the 'round-up' are either branded by the owner of the range on which they are or are sold for the benefit of the association"—of cattle raisers.

Mr. Maverick, a civil engineer by profession, like most enterprising men of that day went in heavily for land that could then be bought at 5 and 10 cents per acre and he never engaged in any other business.

In 1845, while he was living temporarily at Decrows Point, on the Gulf coast, a neighbor who owed him $1,200 paid the debt in cattle at $3 per head. He did not want the cattle but took them and put them in charge of some negroes, nominally slaves, but essentially free, and with his family returned to San Antonio. The cattle remained on the Gulf until 1853, when they were moved up to the San Antonio River, about 50 miles below the city of that name, and continued in the vigilant care of the same colored family.

Mr. Maverick was so occupied with public duties and other private affairs that he gave no attention to his herds. They were left to graze, to fatten, and wander away at will on the prairies. His unbranded cattle found on the range were referred to as Maverick's, meaning that they belonged to the herd of Mr. Maverick. They were so neglected that from the original stock of 400 taken over for debt in 1845 he still had just that number 11 years later when he sold them to Mr. Toutant de Beauregard, a brother of the Confederate general, from whom I had the story as well as from members of the family. I have seen all the letters that were written and received during those 11 years that referred to the cattle venture, and they establish the accuracy of what I am saying.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the true story of the origin of the word "maverick," as applied to unbranded cattle, and I hope that its publication in the RECORD will end forever the ridiculous lies about a "cattle king" who never had profit out of the business, or more cattle than the 400 head he bought in 1845 and which had not increased in 1856, when he sold them.

Let me go back for a moment to the political history of the Republic.

THE ALAMO.

On the 23d of February, 1836, the 150 Texas troops in the Mission of the Alamo, in San Antonio, were attacked by Mexican soldiers under Gen. Santa Anna. That was the beginning of one of the most historic sieges of all time, one of the most impressive tragedies, and in its consequences one of the most important events in history. Directly traceable to it, and the supplemental engagement at San Jacinto, was the introduction of a new member into the family of nations, and later an accretion to the territory of the United States of an area much greater than the original thirteen States, plus Kentucky, Vermont, Tennessee, Maine, and West Virginia.

On the 1st of March 32 gallant men from Gonzales joined the 150 who were within the walls of the Alamo, and none of the 182 ever came out alive. The army of Santa Anna certainly contained as many as 4,000 men, and estimates run as high as 6,000. The odds were more than 20 to 1 against Col. Travis and his men, and under such circumstances, with no possibility of early relief, the end was never in doubt. On the 5th of March the final assault was made. Among the Texans there was no thought of surrender and all fought to the death, taking an appalling toll from the Mexicans. Veracious chronicles have it that the bodies of Col. Travis, who commanded, and David Crockett, his aid, were surrounded by heaps of slain. I do not doubt that the same thing would have been said of Col. Bowie if he had not been ill and confined to his bed. But where all were heroes why discriminate?

A flame of righteous wrath swept over Texas, and the rest of the war was fought with the battle cry "Remember the Alamo." Meanwhile, Gen. Houston, for strategic reasons, had been falling back toward east Texas, and at San Jacinto, on the 21st of April he engaged and destroyed the Mexican Army that was under the command of Santa Anna himself. In a few minutes after the battle began the Mexicans were in full retreat. The next morning the self-styled "Napoleon of the West" was a prisoner and a supplicant for the favor of Sam Houston.

The Texans killed, wounded, and captured more than double the number of men in Houston's command, which was a very proper score.
